it. But Asdrubal having passed Iberus, and coming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell upon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre from Tarracon, whom he found carelesse, as after a victory, roaving abroad in the countrey; and with great slaughter drave them aboard their ships. This done, hee ranne up into the Countrey, where he withdrew the Ilergetes from the Roman partie, though they had given Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the same season was gone to visit and aide his Fleet: where having set things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himselfe againe over Iberus. So the Ilergetes were compelled by force; having lost Athanasia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Austani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping, in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of silver. During the siege, the Lacetani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours, and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their Company dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause remembered, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ, subject unto Rome, should, in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold Warre against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleve, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred up the Ilergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilest himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saved himselfe beyond Iberus. Phelimus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too farre into the Countrey, was beaten by Asdrubal backe to his ships, whence he durst not stirre, untill winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wonne, by returning upon them, unlooked for through a deepe snow. As for the Lacetani, Ilergetes, and the rest, we may reasonably thinke, that they sought their owne benefit: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, upon sense of injuries received, or apprehension of more grievous tyranny, under which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, hearkening againe unto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under their owne Countrey Lawes, and not under Governours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: even from henceforth unto the dayes of Augustus Caesar; till when they were never throughly conquered.

The yeere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victory against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too farre on ground, hee tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victory, above one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates in Spain, are said to have submitted themselves unto the Romans, or given Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flie into the utmost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Lusitania. Yet it followes, that the Ilergetes did againe rebell; that Asdrubal hereupon came over Iberus; and that Scipio (though having easily vanquished the Ilergetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred up against him the Celiberians, that lately were become his subjects, and had given him hostages. These tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battels; whereinto they slew fifteene thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand Prisoners. Then arrived Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren joyntly admittred the businesse in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did haake constant, without both feare or doubt, passe over Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many others, the same Celiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal.

Asdrubal, Boſtar, the Governor of Saguntum, a ſimple man, ſuffered himſelf to be perſwaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favor and hearty good will of the country, was by freely reſtoring unto them their hoſtages; as reſting, without any pledge, aſſured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being truſted with this meſſage and reſtitution of the hoſtages, carried them all to the Roman Generals: perſwading them, as he had done Boſtar, to make the Liberality their own. Hereby the Romans purchaſed much love, if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we find, that all the Spaniſh Hoſtages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearſing ſo many particularities, whereof I can believe ſo few. But ſince we find no better certainties, we muſt content our ſelves with theſe.

The yeare following was like unto this: Asdrubal muſt be beaten again. The two Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. makes war by Land, P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten foure thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe out of Africk: He repairs his Fleet; and provides every way to make reſiſtance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Maſters of his ſhips, revolt unto the Romans: becauſe they had bin chidden the laſt yeare for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navie. The revolt of theſe ſhip-maſters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spaine. Theſe doe much miſchief, ſo that Asdrubal is faine to make a journey to them. His ſudden coming cuts off ſome of them, that were found ſcattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, ſo valiantly aſſaile him, that they drive him, for very feare, to encampe himſelfe ſtrongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battell. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his provisions; and ſhortly make themſelves Maſters of the Country round about. This good ſucceſſe breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kills the moſt of them, and diſperſeth the reſt; ſo that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal ſhould leade his Armie forth into Italie; which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had bin informed by his letters in what hard caſe he was; and had ſo weakly ſupplied him, as is ſhewed before. But thus we find it reported: and that upon the very rumour of this his journey, almoſt all Spaine was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore ſends word preſently to Carthage, That this muſt not be ſo; or, if they will needs have it ſo, that then they muſt ſend him a Succellor, and well attended with a ſtrong Army, which to employ they ſhould find worke more than enough; ſuch notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuſe; Asdrubal muſt needs be gone: Himilco, with ſuch forces as are thought expedient for that ſervice, both by land and ſea, is ſent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furniſh himſelfe with ſtore of money, that he might have wherewithall to win the friendſhip of the Gauls; through whole Countries he muſt paſſe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembering to eaſe him of this care. But ſince it can be no better, he layes great Impoſitions upon all the Spaniards his ſubjects: and having gotten together as much treaſure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing theſe newes, are carefull how to arreſt him on the way. They beſiege Ibera (ſo called of the Rivers name running by it) the richeſt towne in all thoſe quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon ſteps aſide to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battell with him: which they winne the more eaſily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquiſhed at home, than get the victory, and afterwards be haled into Italie. Great numbers are ſlaine: and few ſhould have eſcaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away ere the battels were fully joyned. Their Campe the Romans take and ſpoile: whereby (queſtionleſſe) they are marvellouſly enriched; all the money that could be raked together in Spaine being carried along in this Italian expedition. This dayes event joyneſs all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Country ſtood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal ſo far from all thought of travelling into Italie, that it leaves him ſmall hope of keeping himſelfe ſafe in Spaine. Of theſe exploits advertisement is ſent to Rome; and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they have neither money, apparell, nor bread, wherewith to ſuſtaine their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting: ſo as unleſſe they may be ſupplied from

Liv. lib. 23.

Rome,

Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. Theſe Letters come to Rome in an evil ſeaſon: the State being ſcarcely able, after the loſſe at Cannæ, to help it ſelfe at home. Yet reliefe is ſent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare unto the Common-wealth, ſhall be inſerted elſe-where, into the relation of things whereof the truth is leſſe queſtionable. At the coming of this ſupply, the two Scipio's purſue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. Wher ſelfe can we thinke, that remember the laſt newes of him, and how fearfully he miſtruſted his owne ſafety? They find him, and Magus and Amilcar the ſon of Bomilcar, with an Army of threeſcore thouſand men, beſieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Orielius, and others, probably conjecture to have ſtood, where Carinena is now, in the Kingdom of Aragon; for there was Illiturgi, afterwards called Forum Julii, quite another way) a Towne of the Illegeres their neereſt Neighbours, for having revolted unto the Romans. The towne is greatly diſtreſſed; but moſt of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore brake through betweene the Enemies Campes, with terrible ſlaughter of all that reſiſt them: and having victualled the place, encourage the towne-men to defend their walls as ſtoutly, as they ſhould anon behold them fighting manfully with the beſiegers, in their behalfe. So they iſſue forth, about ſixteen thouſand againſt threeſcore thouſand: and killing more of the enemies, than themſelves were in number, drave all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one out of his quarter; and tooke that day, beſides priſoners and other bootie, fifty and eight Enſignes.

The Carthaginian Army, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall upon Incibi, that ſtood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by warre, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondered, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: ſince Asdrubal was lately driven to poll the Country, wanting money of his owne; and being beaten in his journey, had loſt his wealthy carriages, when his Campe was taken after the battell by Ibera. Howſoever it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their cuſtome) are beaten againe at Incibi: where there were of them above thirteene thouſand ſlaine, and above three thouſand taken; beſides two and forty Enſignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them unto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antius, or ſome other Hiſtorian, to whom Livius gave credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories; whereof theſe good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large acceſſe of Dominion, winter on their owne ſide of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spaniards riſe againſt Asdrubal; and are overthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to help theſe his friends, is forced to make great haſt over the River. At Caſtrum Alium, a place in the mid-way between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and ſtores the place with victuals, being ſtrong and defensible; as intending to make it his ſeate for a while. But the Country round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horſe have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling alſo upon ſome ſtragglers, or ſuch as lagged behind their fellows in march, they have cut off two thouſand of them. Hereupon it is thought behoovefull, to retire unto ſome place more aſſured. So Publ. withdraws himſelfe unto Mons viſtoriae: that riſing ſomewhat Eaſtward from Incibi, over-looketh the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians purſue him: His brother Cn. repairs unto him; and Asdrubal the ſon of Geſto, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie thus neere incamped together, P. Scipio, with ſome light-armed, going cloſely to view the places thereabouts, is diſcovered by the enemies: who are lik to take him, but that he withdraws himſelfe to an high piece of ground; where they beſiege him, untill his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Caſtulo, a great city of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being farre diſtant from them, and ſeated on the head of the River Bætis. Nevertheleſſe the Carthaginians paſſe over Iberus, to beſiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garriſon, hoping to win it by famine. We may juſtly wonder, what ſhould move them to neglect the rebellion of Caſtulo, yea and the Roman Army lying ſo cloſe by them, and to ſecke adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had been ſo grievouſly beaten the yeere before. But thither they goe: and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out upon them the next day, and in two battels kils above twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with fixe and thirty Ensignes. This victory (doubtlesse) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Manda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasted foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victory; and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, & twelve thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fifty Ensignes. The Carthaginians flee to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquished the Carthaginians againe: but kils not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature so set war on foot, quickly fill up the broken troups of Asdrubal, who having also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are even ashamed to leave Saguntum entrallled unto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may we thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Country once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appears) to goe their way without it: so as they need not be blusht, for having so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were unable to performe. At the present they wonne Saguntum: and restored the possession thereof unto such of the poore disperfed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Country of the Turdetani, that had ministred unto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would have disturbed them, if they had beene able.

But over-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their brave exploits, we can perceive none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals journey; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they have landed at Emporia, an Haven towne, built and peopled by a Colony of the Phocaeans, kinne to the Masilians, friends to the Romans; They have easily wonne to their party, lost, recovered, and lost againe, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by persuasion, other-whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne unsettled passions; and now finally they have won a Town, whereof the Carthaginians held intire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleve, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembered, after every one of which Asdrubal fate downe before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous unto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the levie and arrivall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had beene absolute Masters of the field, when they wonne Saguntum, they would not have consumed a whole yeere following, in practising only with the Celiberians the next adjoining people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeeres businesse. Of these Celiberians we heare before, That they have yeelded up themselves unto the Romans; for security of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serve in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; perceive; unlesse perhaps in those daies it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Livie followes, to call every messenger, or straggler, that entered their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italy, there to deal with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne backe into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellows at home are the lesse unwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next have a desire to lead them into Italy. Hereof we finde more than probability, when these mercenary Celiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this access of strength, divide their forces, and seeke out the Enemies, who lie not farre off with three Armies. Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, is nearest at hand; even among the Celiberians, at Anisorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the fear is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Mago the sonne of Gefso, hearing the newes, will make use of their distance, which is five dayes march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Country, save themselves from being over-taken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie; leaving the third part, and all the Celiberians, to his brother. He that hath the longer journey to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his lives end. Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gefso, are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessity. They joyne their forces together; meet with Publius Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that hee is driven to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches: wherein he thinks himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masanassa, Prince of the Masagis, Numidians, bordering upon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremisen: to whom the chiefe honour of this service is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case, P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis a Spanish Prince, is coming with seven thousand & five hundred of the Sussetani, to joyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut up, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis upon the way; leaving T. Fomertius his Lieutenant, with a small company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appear (whom he thought to have beene ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come so fast upon him in Reare, that P. Scipio, uncertaine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where need most requireth, is strucke through with a lance, and slaine: very few of his Army escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty dayes after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celiberian Mercenaries all forsake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Country. If Anisorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it, a Celiberian towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly beleve, that they were won by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they should have had for hazzarding their lives. Cn. Scipio therefore being unable to stay them, and no lesse unable, without their helpe, either to resist the enemy, or to joyne with his brother, maketh a very violent retreat; herein onely differing from plaine flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presseth hard upon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gefso, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from them all, by night; but is overtaken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stony ground, where growes not so much as a shrubbe, unfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill he findes of easie ascent on every side; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with packe-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weak defences the Carthaginians soone teare in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that saving themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoining, escape unto T. Fomertius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as before said. It is a terrible overthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could breake out, and throwd themselves within woods adjoining, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fontem is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearfull (as may be supposed) of his owne life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Armie, had little hope to remaine long safe within it. Thither comes L. Marius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who having gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretty Army. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Marius before Fontem the Lieutenent, as well they may. For Asdrubal, the sonne of Gefeo comming upon them; this L. Marius so encourageth his men, (fondly weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately slaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessity, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might have gotten, but that he wisely founds the retreat; preserving the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken; but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they returne to their former security; and utterly despising him, let neither Corps de garde nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were neere. Marius therefore animates his souldiers with lively words; and tells them, That there is no adventure more safe, than that which is furthest from suspicion of being under-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate piece of service. So he leads them forth by night, and steales upon the Campe of Asdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast asleepe, or very drowzie, He enters without resistance, fires their Cabines, and gives a terrible alarme; so that all affrighted, the Carthaginians runne head-long one upon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Campe, Marius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many do, that there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Annius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battailes. That, whilest Marius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Lucius reporteth as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captaine Marius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with so small forces, and in such distresse, He could cleerely get off from the Enemies, & give them any parting blow, though it were farre lesse than that which is here set downe.

Of these occurrents L. Marius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good service, whatsoever it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vice-gerent in Spain: which the better to intimate unto them, He stiled himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moved with the tidings than the case required: and therefore tooke such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the companies levied to serve in that Province, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the City it selfe, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for that tide of Propretor, which Marius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended offended at his presumption in usurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to have the Souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all convenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about sixethousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Lutines, with three hundred Roman horse, and of the Lutines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and afforded means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the victories of Marius would ill have served, either to keepe footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Army, which was under Marius and Fontem; he found surer tokens of the overthrowes received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Marius had made his vaults unto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaime, it would not easily be devised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Ausetians, neer enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lagules arvi; out of which there was no issue, but only through a streight, whereon the Roman seized at his first comming. What should have tempted any man of understanding to incampe in such a place, I do not finde: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himselfe thus lockt up, made offer to depart forthwith out of all Spain, and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition, that he and his Armie might bee thence dismissed; That he spent many dayes, in entertaining parlee with Claudius about this businesse; That night by night he conveyed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a misty day, He stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his Camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spain; we shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Country, with one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages, through which the footmen could hardly creepe out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke misty day. Wherefore in giving beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to have been of far lesse value. Howsoever it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recover the old which had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Marius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconsull, & (perhaps) yong Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloved memory of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it revived in one of the same family. Whether upon these, or upon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province; and Publius the sonne of P. Scipio sent Proconsull into Spain.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, & singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other vertues that purchase love, of which qualities what great use he made, shall appear in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, favouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity; How he used to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference with Jupiter; How a Dragon (which must have bene one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himselfe) was thought to have conversed with his Mother, entering her Chamber often, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answers; I hold them no better than fables, devised by Historians, who thought thereby to add unto the glory of Rome: that this noble City might seeme, not onely to have surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serve to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconsull was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Capitaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart, to adventure himselfe in such a desperate service; and finally, That this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure & twenty yeeres of age, getting up on an high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred upon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Marius no better than dreames: and either very unreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these incoherences, which I finde in the two partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insift.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsull into Spain; & with him was joynd M. Junius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them tenne thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia; & marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrivall, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province: which he entertained with such a majestie, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the 20 enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could give any reason of it. If we must beleve this, then must we needs beleve, that their feare was even as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeare) hee did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: upon which he came unexpected, with five and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. He assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and worne it by assault the 30 first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence upon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might have bene well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discovered unto Scipio, a secret passage unto the walls; whereof the Town-men themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing upon a demy-Iland, betwene an Haven and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had founded; and finding some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading up to the Navill, Scipio thrust therein to some companies of his men; who recovered the top of the walles without resistance: the place being left without guard; as able to defend it selfe by the naturall strength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; easily forced a gate, and gave free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Towne, Livie himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceive how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africke and Spain was heaped up in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoining Provinces) whom Scipio intreated with singular courtesie; restoring them unto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, neerest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forsooke the Carthaginian party, & joynd with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended: for that he did not vaunt himself, as commonly fugitives use, of the pleasure, which he did unto the Romans, in revolting from their enemies, but rather excused this his changing side, as being there-to compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians; & invited by the honourable dealing of Scipio.

Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no unsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Scipio; then could nothing have bin devised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when hee should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Uncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, & held them by strength; yet were the Romans never masters of the Countrie, till this worthy Commander, by recovering 10 their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won unto himselfe the assured love and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generalls, when they heard of this losse, were very sorry: yet nevertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, having stolne a Towne by surprise, was too farre transported, and over-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Uncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne conjecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to divert them, under-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Uncle, upon the like occasion, fate downe before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not bene much amiss, if the passage over the Lake had bene undiscovered, and the Towne held out some longer while. For howsoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in coming to such good issue upon the first day: yet in the generality of the business, between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spain should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, & Asdrubal, the sonne of Geso, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingering warre of taking and retaking Townes, whilst the maine of the Carthaginian forces, under Asdrubal, the son of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprize: even to fight in triall of the Em- 30 pire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, coming upon Asdrubal; his Vant-currers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they drave them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, even by that small peece of service, how full of spirit the Roman Army was, and how dejected the Enemie. Asdrubal therefore by night rettyred out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the River, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of access on the fore-side; by which himselfe got up, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly encamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, betwene 40 the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more upon bravery, than he might not seeme to hide himselfe within the Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazzard of a battaile, for which this was no equal ground. But such advantage of place could not save him from the Romans. They climbed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plaine, up into his Campe on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they drave both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to sie. Out of such a battaile, wherein hee had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troupes, to have marched towards the Pyrenees, having sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Nevertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Geso, are reported after this, to have consulted with him about this Warre; and finally to have concluded, that goe he needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to have bin true, it shall appeare at his coming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires have too long detained us.

§. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. Posthumus the Roman Generall, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip King of Macedonia enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans joining with the Aetolians, make warre upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him, the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

W Elest Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoyced (as may be thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of such mighty aide, as was decreed to be sent thence unto him. In former times he had found worke enough, to carry the Romans corne into his owne barnes, and to drive away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Army; by making him Master of the open field. He might perhaps have forced some walled townes, in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Canna: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must have endured the Winter and Spring following, untill corne were ripe, would have grievously punished him for such employment of the Summer. This may have been the reason, why he forbore to adventure upon Rome, after his victory at Canna. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the Citie at his first coming; want of victuals would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea, many of the people that opened so hastily their gates unto him, upon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the event of another battaile: if being, either for want of means to force the Citie, or of necessities to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the walles of Rome, he had presented himselfe unto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, unlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and travell was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege unto that proud Citie, so which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the Winter was passed over joyfully, saving that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply there arrived no more, than onely the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we finde, that after this he had above thirty of them; whereas all, save one, that he brought over the Alpes, had bin lost in his journey through the Marshes of Hauria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was as thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as he himselfe had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the journey; thant to commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazzard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Haven, to receive the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull provisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere served, He tooke the field: and having finished what rested to be done at Cassinum, sought to make himselfe Matter of some good Haven-town thereabout; that might serve to entertaine the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same end to the Lucians: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Isles of Sicill and Sardinia; since the siege of Rome must needs be deferred unto another yeere. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or over-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slew above two thousand of his men; with the losse of fewer than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Peitella, or Peitilia by force; after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Consenza; and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded unto him: as did all other places thereabout; except onely the Towne of Rhegium, over against Sicill.

The great faith of the Peilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good government, under which the Roman subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campanians, and others, whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seeme to prove the contrary, we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Sovereignty, and were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefits allay. The Peilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers received answer from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not 10 lef meanes, to relieve their Associates that were so farre distant. The Peilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman subjection, that had a private jurisdiction within themselves) fell down to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to give them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation againe: and having thoroughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to give any reliefe. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their owne safety, as having already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Peilians (as was said) held out some moneths: and having striven in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparent
10 possibility, gave to the Carthaginians a bloody victory over them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might have reduced them into termes of great extremity. For whereas, in a great bravery, before their losse at Canna, they had shewed their high minde, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay upon them so neere at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Posthumus Albinus their Praetor they had sent, with an Army of five and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian King Pinem they
10 had sent for their tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliver hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedonia they had sent, to require, that he should deliver up unto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subject and Rebell, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumus with all his Army was cut in pieces by the Gauls, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his overthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his coming, the Enemies had sawed the Trees so far, that a little force would serve to cast them downe: When therefore Posthumus, with his whole Army, was entred into this dangerous passage, the
10 Gauls, that lay about the wood, began to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were over-whelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious worke of sawing so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might have blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the device was subject; I do not well conceive. Yet some such thing may have been done: and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the savage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Country now so civil, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumus his skull, being cleansed, and trimmed 10 up with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessel, for the use of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great overthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no lesse than the calamity. But sorrow could give no remedie to the mischiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to revenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither doe I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, & Scerdileus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few yeeres following, the Romans dealt upon even termes; entreating their assistance against Philip and Perseus; not commanding their dutie, as Vassalls. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having

having assured his affaires in Greece, & enjoying leisure to looke into the doings abroad, He sent Embassadors to Hannibal: with whom he made a league, upon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman war, untill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoile therein to be gotten, should be left entire unto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Army should passe into Greece, and there assist Philip, untill he had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leaving semblably unto him the full possession of that country, and the Isles adjoining. But such predisposition of Kingdomes and Provinces, is lightly controlled by the divine Providence, which therein shewes It selfe; not (as Herodotus fally termes it, and like an Atheist) envious or malicious, but very just and majesticall, in up-holding that unspeakable greatnesse of Sovereignty, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadors that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: & being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessity. These newes were so welcome, that the joy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquiry. So they were lovingly feasted, and freely dismissed with guides that should lead them the way, and shew them how to avoide the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their journey, fell wilfully into the campe of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the businesse, about which they came, upon the points before remembred. In their returne homeward, they happened againe unluckily to be decryed by the Roman fleet; which, mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gave them chase. They did their best to have escaped: but being over-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboard; and trusting to the lie that once had served them, said it againe, That having beene sent from King Philip, to make a league with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Prætor, unto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now less credible than before: and (which marred all) Gesco, Boskar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparent. Wherefore a little inquisition served to finde all out: so that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were delivered up, and the whole businesse confessed. The Embassadors and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speed; concluding, as was agreed before; onely with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heavey weight this Macedonian warre, in an evill houre, was likely to fall upon them, when their shoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and sutable unto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would have beateen upon them from Spain. They judged it more easie, with small forces to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, joyning with Hannibal in such a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegiance, not onely of the Latin, and other, their most faithfull Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies, that held all privileges of the City, it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Prætor, with twenty Quinquaginta Gallies, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian, and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begunne. Philip was busie about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italy, setting upon Apollonia; and thence falling upon Oricum; which he won, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epirots craved helpe of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other busines to do. The garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Towne-men in good order; but not to keep out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspicion. Valerius therefore easly regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand thousand men, under Nævius Crispus, an under-taking and expert Capitaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable fallie; and brake into Philips Trenches with lo great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his campe, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his fleet from Oricum, stopped up the mouth of the River, so that he was faine to burn his ships, (which belike were no better than long boates) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwayes enemy to the Crowne of Macedon: & easly perswaded them (being so affected, as hath else where beene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moved the troublesome spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; & whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promise, as if already it had bin his owne. So a league was made betweene them: and afterward solemnly published at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitol. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Coreyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrey should be subdued, and left unto the Ætolians, the pillage onely to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should bee with Provision, to hold no longer than whilst hee abstained from doing injurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeed the onely point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promised as much on the Romans behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, unless it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this league was place reserved for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or favoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Antalus, Pleuratus, & Sceurdileus: the first of which reigned at Pergamus, in Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to be spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates are thrust into the Treatie, rather to give it countenance, than for any readinesse which they disclosed to enter therinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Prætor, with Dorimachus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generalls must make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had onely the title of Nacarre, was said to court the Maiors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when hee heard whereunto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Army; made a countenance of warre upon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to inest the Kingdom of Macedon; wasted the Countrie about Oricum & Apollonia; and over-running the Pelagians, Dardaniens, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessaly, whence he made shew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to stir up all the Greeks adjoining, against the Ætolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Countrey. To which purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perses, his son and heire, with foure thousand men, upon their borders: with the rest of his Armie, before greater businesse should over-take and entangle him; Hee made a long journey into Thrace, against a people called the Medes: that were wont to fall upon Macedon, whenever the King was absent. The Ætolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrey, ere he should be able to returne. Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniade and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes, conveniently situated to let in an Army; and consigned them unto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we say) every Mothers sonne of them, in defence of their Countrey; together with the great haile of the Macedonian (who layed aside all other businesse) to succour these his friends; caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprise. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Ætolians fell upon Ancyra, which they tooke: the Romans assailing by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Towne, and the Romans the spoile.

For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; & P. Sulpicius sent in his stead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Antalus out of Asia came over to assist the Ætolians. Hee was chiefly mooved by his owne jealousy lousie of Philips greatnesse: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity of being chosen by the Ætolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titular, he tooke in very loving part. Against the forces which Antalus and the Romans had sent, being joyned with the maine power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome neighbours desired peace of him, and used their best meanes to get it. But when the day appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadors, in stead of making submission, proposed unto him such intolerable conditions, as ill befecemed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any love of peace, but feare of being besieged in their owne Towns, that had made them desirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Antalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as ever: and thrust a garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatened Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the Ireight from Naupactus, wasted the country in a terrible bravery: wherein Philip required them; comming upon them in great hast from the Nemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them salter away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heate of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Antalus no lesse than Antalus held suspected the power of Philip, sent a Navie into Greece, to assist the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians: and upon greater reason; as being more interessed in the successe of his affaires. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoved him, to use the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first have kept those Enemies from fastening upon any part of Greece, than afterward it could serve to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that country. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad neighbours to the Achaians; his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Town, hee was encountered by the Ætolian and Roman garrison, which drave him backe with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerful in working. The King had received no great detriment, in his retreat from Elis; rather he had given testimony of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine under him. He had also loone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand, with some twenty thousand head of Cattel, which they had brought together into a place of safety, as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman foragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily under a low tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered up by an Ætolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philip's death. The horse was well knowne, and the tale beleaved. All Macedon therefore was in an uproare: and not onely the Borderers, ready to fall upon the Country, but some Captains of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achaians. He also tooke order, to have Beacons erected, that might give him notice of the Enemies doings, upon whom he meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-favouredly: especially in the Ile of Eubœa, where one Plator betrayed to Antalus and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to helpe it: where also the strong City of Chalcis was likely to have been lost, if he had not come so the sooner. He made such hasty marches, that he had almost taken Antalus in the City of Opus: This City, lying over against Eubœa, Antalus had wonne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had used: now because the Roman Souldiers had defrauded him in the sacke of Oreum, and taken all to themselves; it was agreed, that Antalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his thursers. But while he was busie, in drawing as much money as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tydings of Philip's arrivall, made him leave all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships, finding the Romans gone.

gone before, upon the like feare. Either the indignitie of this misadventure, or tydings of Prusias the Syrian his invasion upon the kingdome of Pergamus; made Antalus returne home, without staying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus, won Torone, Trionos, Drymus, and many small towns in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more braverie than importance, against the Ætolians. In the mean season, Archandaris, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had bene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philip's arrivall, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to choose two new kings, and to conform themselves to their old manner of government. But their estate was so far out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proved no lesse unfortunate, than had bin their attempts of recovering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a tyrant rose up among them: upon whom succeeded this Machanidas, and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman side, for feare of the Achaians, that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip; and bared extremely the name both of Tyrant and Lacedæmonian. But of these we shall speake more hereafter.

Philip entring into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Countrey; spake brave words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to doe with an Enemy, that was very nimble, and made warre by rusting away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them, such haste they made, for feare of being overtaken. But flight, he said, was not alwayes prosperous: he should one day light upon them; as ere this he sundry times had done, and still to their losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For he restored unto their Nation some Townes that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymaans, that had bene taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, he sought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing over the Corinthian Gulfe, he fell upon the Ætolians; whom he drave into the mountains and woods, or other their strongest holds, and wasted their Country. This done, he tooke leave of the Achaians, and returned home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants; and animated them so well, that they rested fearelesse of any threatening danger. Then had he leisure to make war upon the Dardaniens, ill neighbours to Macedon: with whom nevertheless he was not so far occupied; but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred gallies, whereby to make himselfe Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Antalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldened him to make strong warre upon the Ætolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans, either some displeasure, conceived against their Confederates, or some feare of danger at home; when Asdrubal was ready to fall upon Italia; caused them to give over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Ætolians therefore, being driven to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace unto Philip; and accept it, upon what ever conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no looner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirty five gallies, came over in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aside to Dyrrachium and Apollonia, making a great noise, as if with these his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The King presented him battell, but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himselfe close within the wals of Apollonia, making some Overtures of peace: which caused Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in vill part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For, notwithstanding the royall offer that he made them, to serve their turne in Italia; and assist them, in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Etolian Pyracies. Onely once they came to his helpe, which was, at his last journey into Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arrivall: having done nothing, and pretending feare of being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip, with his owne Navie, durst boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This retchlesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to have bin one of Hanno his tricks, whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly, to heare that so great a King made offer to serve in person under Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as Envie could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians unto a safe and thrifty course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres so mighty a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection unto Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they should doe well to save charges, and feed the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing, yet would it serve to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home, that might finde this Enemy worke abroad. So should the Roman Armies bee lessened in Italie; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be urged unto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea, scarce to the labour of giving him thanks. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should be free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints unto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges betwene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africa, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsell of Hanno and his fellows were such as this, or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition, without his advice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good, but rather dodged with him, even in their little courtesie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee began the building of an hundred Gallies, as if he would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainly given credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Etolians had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessitie, he might give over the warre, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meereley his owne, and he unable to manage it.

The vanity of which their conceits would appeare unto them, when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recovered in this war, being part of their old Illyrian conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the covenants, that somewhat might seeme to have bene gotten. On the other side, the Aimanes were appointed to returne under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Oriclus probably conjectures) the people of the Countrey about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not give peace, as they would seeme to have done, but accepted it, upon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependents of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achaens, Boeotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis the tyrant of Lacedaemon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and and Athenians. The Etolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Etolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their league with Philip) were also infected by the Romans; that were never flow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much upon their old honour; and loved to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the setting downe of their names in this Treaty, served the Romans to good purpose: for as much as they were a buisie people, and ministred occasion to renew the War, when means did better serve to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieving the publike necessities of their Common- weale.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halves: and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would have served (if good order had been taken) to finish the whole Warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had become the lesse harmfull, if their care of Italy had bin such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal to weary himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeare to yeare, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could have desired. The death of Polthumius, and destruction of his whole Army in Gaul; the begun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Isle of Sicily; as also that War, of which we last spake, threatened to Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so nearely after their terrible overthrow at Canna, among so many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would utterly have funke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first year, yet at least the second, sent over to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversity of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administred matter unto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, wherupon to work. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new concurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their severall Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperity of Hannibal in his Italian Warre, should have been strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender Troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the Warre in Spain; the lingering ayd which they sent to uphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-near beaten downe; their triling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hasty catching at Sicily: little deserved to be thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, considered apart by it selfe, was no otherwise to be allowed, as discreetly undertaken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italy made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serve to content Hannibal, then must he patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necessity; to feed his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cume, and other places: being loth to spend his Army in an hard siege, that was to be relieved for a worke of more importance. Many offers he made upon Nola, but always with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battell with him there: yet under the very Walles of the Towne; having the assistance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great marvel; his forces being then divided, and imployed in sundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was even in those dayes, a strong City; and required a years work to have taken it by force.

unto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they served in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing, unless sicknesse forced them to breake his order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneventum: where the newly enfranchised Soldiers were feasted in publicke by the townsmen; some sitting, some enstanding, and all of them having their heads covered (as was the custome of slaves manifesting) with caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterward hung up in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Liberty; which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first battell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italy; the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hama, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasure was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serve to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serve to feed their Townes and Armies, without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few there were in Italy that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worke doe than before; as living upon the same trade, and subject to the same inconveniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised upon them by the Poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greauesse of the warre within the bowels of Italy, that could not bee thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Easterne parts of Italy, if they were not at the cost to finde him work at home; the greater threats of Albinus, to follow his brother over the Alpes, as soon as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spain; and the povertie of the common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driven almost even to extreme want of counsell. But being urged by the violence of swift necessity, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spain; they resolved upon the only course, without the which the Citie could not have subsisted.

They called the people to assembly; wherein Quintus Fulvius the Prætor layd open the publicke wants; and plainly said, That in this exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparel, or the like things needfull to the Souldiers; but that such as had stuffe, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities and labours, untill the warre were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Revenues, that the charge was undertaken by private men; and the Armie in Spain as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had beene full. Shortly after this, Marcus Atilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus, the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intensitive to the correction of those, that had mis-behaved themselves in this present warre. They began with L. Cecilius Metellus; who, after the battell at Canna, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had beene no better than lost. After him, they tooke in hand those, that having brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his Campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captives names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; even whosoever had not served in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had used to be) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate,

Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should bee transported into Sicil, there to serve untill the end of the Warre, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canna. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) upon those, whose unhoneest or unseemly behaviour fell not within the compasse of the Law. They tooke also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publicke Horles of service, unto such as they thought meet; or tooke them away for their mis-behaviour. Generally, they had the over-sight of mens lives and manners: and their censure was much revered and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of ranke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasurie, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Morallitie, they had the charge of all publicke Workes; as mending of High-ways, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man incroached upon the Streets, High-ways, or other places that ought to bee common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publicke Revenues to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding unto this Office; as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserve the dignity of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxious unto the Censors; which were alwayes of that Order, and carefull to up-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-wealth being now impoverished by Warre, and having small store of Lands to let, or of customes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations; or if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generosity of the Romans. They that had beene accustomed in more happy times, to undertake such pieces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had beene no such want: promising liberally their cost and travel; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the Warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaves, that lately had beene enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forebare the price of them, untill the Citie were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieve, as farre forth as every one was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widowes living under Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Questor kept a Booke of all that was layd out for the sustenance of these Widowes and Orphans: whilst the whole stocke was used by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Countrey was in so great want.

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded halfe so much commodity, as might be laid in ballance against these miseries, wherinto their Estate was now reduced. Nevertheless if we consider things aright, the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom the forthwith under-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto she attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names we have already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metall grew more hard and solide: and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Citie of Athens, when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to ashes, and taken from every particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happinesse of the universality. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State, whose demerion or stemme is small, may aptly serve to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comesto passe, where all regard of domestick prosperity is laid aside; and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his Countrey. Hereof I might say that our Age hath seen a great example, in the united Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches, and

and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Towns, or almost of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alus, were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme industry, and straining themselves to fill their publike Treasure, they are all growne wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their services by Land. Wherefore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient resolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and above all other, the great love of the Common-Weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly say, That the Citie was never in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, should in all respect have bene more deare unto them; if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens and Subiects of Rome could have beleev'd their owne interest to be as great, in those warres which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded upon so great vertue, could not have been throwne down by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never so many. But unto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who though he hath given unto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subject unto the affections, which draw on these fatal changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIII.

The Romans winne some Townes backe from Hannibal. Hannibal winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the people of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the Warre: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industry, in seeking to recover what had been lost. The Towne of Casiline, Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian garrison; and likely to have bene relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola, had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Nevertheless, the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: saying, that the enterprize was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. Hee said, That many such things, as were not at first to have been under-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, unto be prosecuted to the best effect. So the siege held on: and the Town was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craved parlee; offering to give it up, so as all might have leave to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diversly reported) Marcellus leizing upon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fifte of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul, who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slain, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserved commendations, by holding his word good unto these fifty; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such as escaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some equivocation, but hee shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marsam in Gascogne taken by the Marshall Monluc; when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their severall guards, upon hasty desire of being acquainted with the conditions propofed. The Marshall therefore discovering a part of the Walls unguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all save the Governour unto the sword. Herein that Governour of Mount Marsam committed two grosse errors; the one, in that hee gave no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee without Pledges for assurance given and received. Some such oversight the Governour of Casiline seemeth to have committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honorable.

table. When this Work was ended, many small Towns of the Sannites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken, or slain, about five and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the Country grievously waisted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sick at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum, waiting to heare from those, that had promised to give up the Towne. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thrust so many men into it, that the Traytors durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart, having vvearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he vvas not the Country, but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which hee chose for his wintering place; and began to victuall it when Summer was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in love with a young Wench in that Town, in vvvhich regard if he began his winter more timely than otherwise he required, He did not like the Romans; vvvhom necessity enforced, to make their Summer last as long as they were able to travell up and downe the Country.

About this time began great troubles in Sicily, whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Province, as need should require. Of the doings there, which were out more time than his Consulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publike service, to employ oftentimes their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; vvithout regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant unto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne unto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the Campe, and his sonne rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelve Lictors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reverence, to passe by them on horse-back, vvvhich was against the custome. But the sonne perceiving this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feet. The father cheerfully did so; saying, It was my minde, sonne, to make tryall, whether thou diddest understand thy selfe to be Consul. Cassius Albinus a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Cannae, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Town, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came privily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it backe unto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Albinus a patterne to all traytors; using him as Camillus and Fabritius had done those that offered their faithfull service against the Falisci, and King Epyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to revolt from the Romans, than to turne unto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee should be sent to the Towne of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; untill they could better resolve, what to doe with him, or what use to make of him. Hannibal understanding that Albinus was gone, and among the Romans, took it not forrowfully; but thought this a good occasion to seize upon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet that he might seeme rather severe, than coverous, he sent for the wife and children of Albinus into his camp: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the treason, to be burnt alive; and tooke all their goods unto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which hee wonne by Scalado, in a stormy and rainy night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the town; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust most by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was understood, that the Romans had gotten over the Wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the town to be suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdom to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Arpines gave over fight, and entertained parley with the Romans: protesting, that they had been betrayed by their Princes; and were become subject to the Carthaginians, against their wils. In proceffe of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went unto the Roman Consul: and receiving his faith for security of the Town; presently presently made head against the garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is that Hannibal men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and serve on the Roman side, it was yet covenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed : and so Arpi became Roman againe, with little other losse, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors : and unto Cneus Fulvius, another of the Pretors, an hundred & twelve Gentlemen of Capua offered their service; upon no other condition, than to have their goods restored unto them, when their City should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance : but considering the generall harred of the Campans towards Rome, it served to discover the inclination of the Italians in those times ; and how their affections recoyled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had been promised from Carthage. The Consulines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yeelded themselves to Hannibal, returned againe to their old allegiance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himselfe a Capitaine, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in foraging that Country, was slaine by Hanno ; with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent upon Tarentum ; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing over that helpe out of Macedon, so which his Carthaginians hazarded to fend. Long he waited, ere he could bring his desire to passe : and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to prevaile by intelligence ; He contented himselfe with taking in some poore Townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracy, who lay at Rome as Embassadour, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conveyed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his company the next day were so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought backe to Rome, where they suffered death as traitors. By reason of this cruelty, or severity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, so they followed their business the more diligently ; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discovered. Wherefore they sent againe to Hannibal : and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, used much to goe forth of the Towne on hunting by night ; as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldome or never they missed of their game : for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not seeme to have been abroad upon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three dayes journey to Tarentum, if he should have marched thither with his whole Army. This caused his long abode in one place so the lesse to be suspected : as also to make his enemies the more secure. Hee caused it to be given out, that he was sicke. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne careless of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their business in order ; He tooke with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot ; and long before breake of day, made all speed thitherward. Fourescore light horse of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for feare lest he, and his troupe following him, should be discovered. It had beene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged ; and gave order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to stripe them of their booty, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night ; Hannibal guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne : where, according to the tokens agreed upon, making a light to shew his arrivall, Nico, that was within the Town, answered him with another light, in signe that he was ready. Presently Nico beganne to set upon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another Gate : and whistling (as was his manner) called up the Porter ; bidding him make haste, for that he had killed a great Bore, so heavie, that scarce two men could stand under it. So the Porter opened the wicket : and forthwith forthwith entered two young men, loaden with the Bore ; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter stood wondering at the largeness of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Bore-speare : and letting in some thirty armed men, fell upon all the Watch ; whom when he had slaine, he entered the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal entering Tarentum at two Gates, went directly toward the Market place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof, Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the Towne was in an uproare : but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was unskillfully sounded by a Greek in the Theater : which helped the suspicion, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoyle the Towne ; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port : and taking boate, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Haven ; whence he might easily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal assembling the Tarentines, gave them to understand, what good affection he bore them ; inveighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors ; and spake what else he thought fit for the present. This done, and having gotten such spoyle as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, he addressed himselfe against the Citadell ; hoping that if the Garrison would fall out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them unable to defend the Piece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravery falling forth, gave charge upon his men : who fell backe of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gave Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose : and fiercely setting upon the Enemy, drave him backe with great slaughter, as fast as he could runne ; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood upon a Demi-land, that was plaine ground ; and fortified onely with a Ditch and Wall against the Towne, whereunto it was joyned by a cawsey. This cawsey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like sort against the Citadell ; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his helpe, to keep themselves from all danger thence. His worke in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceived hope of winning the Piece it selfe, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilst he was busied in his works, there came by sea a strong supply from Metapontum : which took away all hope of prevailing ; and made him returne to his former counsell. Now so farre as the Tarentine fleet lay within the haven, and could not passe forth, whilst the Romans held the Citadell : it seemed likely that the Towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea : whilst the Roman garrison by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the haven ; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done : for that their Town standing in plaine ground, and their streets being faire and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over land, and lanch them into the sea without. This he undertook, and effected : whereby the Roman garrison was reduced into great necessity ; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal often-times otherwise busied, than his affaires required.

Thus with mutuall losse on both sides, the time passed : and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hastie growth from that want of men, and of all necessities, whereinto the losse at Canna had reduced them. But to fill up these Legions, they were faine to take up young Boyes, that were under seventeen yeares of age : and to send Commissioners above fifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appeare serviceable, and pressing them to the Wars ; making yet a Law, That their yeares of service, whereinto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so young, as if they had been of lawfull age.

Before the Roman Army drew neare, the Campani felt great want of victuall, as if they had already bene besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoyle, which the Romans had in fore-going yeares made upon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal, desiring him to succour them ere they were closed up, as they feared to be shortly. Hee gave them comfortable words, and sent Hanno with an Army to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; against which they should be ready with all manner of carriages, to store themselves with victuals, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantity of graine, that had bene laid up in Cities round about, to be brought into his Campe, three miles from Beneventum. Thither at the time appointed, came no more than forty Carts or Wagons, with a few packe-horses, as if this had bene enough to victuall Capua. Such was the retchlesse of the Campani. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts, since hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore he gave them a longer day; against which he made provision to store them thoroughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needfull for the service, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made inquiry into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Army was gone abroad to make provisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carts and other Varies, lay among the Carthaginians in their Campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set upon a great harvest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves to assault the Enemies Campe: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, he marched thitherward so early in the morning, that he was there with the first breake of day. By coming so unexpected, he had well neare forced the Campe on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the lesse desire had Fulvius to lose more of his men the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke; to send for his fellow-Consul, with the rest of their Army; and to lye betwene Hanno and home; that neither the Campani should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieve them. Being thus discoursing, and about to sound the retreat; he saw that some of his men had gotten over the Enemies Rampart. There was great bootie; or (which was all one to the Souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes over the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, unlesse they would indure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Fear of such ignominy, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers adventure so desperately; that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed his purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them that had already gotten over the Trenches. Thus the Campe was wonne: in which were slaine above fixe thousand; and taken above seven thousand, besides all the store of victualls, and carriages, with abundance of booty, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pitifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the love that he was wont to protest unto their Citie; and how he had made shew to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if he gave not strong and speedy succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoyle, whilst he himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many Townes adjoining, to yeeld unto him. Among the Hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being overtaken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italy, which was called of old, Magna Græcia. These people took to heart the death of their hostages; and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soon as the Roman garrison was taken from them to defend the Citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurini would have done the like, upon the like reason, had not some Companies lye in their Towne;

Towne; which they feared that they should not be able to Master. Nevertheless, they helped themselves by cunning: inviting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neare at hand: against whom whilst they proffered their service to Atinius the Roman Capitaine, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, closed up their gates. A little formality they used in pretending feare, lest the Enemy should break in together with the Romans, in saving Atinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were unacquainted with the practice) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian or no. But this disposition lasted not long: for they that had removed the chiefe impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; and delivered up the Town to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilst the Consuls fortifying Beneventum to secure their backs, addressed themselves to the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of Warre, that had of late been twice Consul, was slaine, either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell unawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to secure the backe of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the great hinderance of that businesse. The Volones or Slaves lately manumitted, forsooke their Ensignes, and went every one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seek them out, and bring them back into their Camp. Nevertheless, the Consuls went forward with their work, & drawing neare to Capua, did all acts of hostility which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua gave them an hard welcome, wherein above fifteen hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better; in somuch, that he caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went severall wayes: Fulvius towards Cannæ, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who having led him a great walk, fetcht a compasse about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Cæcilius Penula, a stout man, & one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would work, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were unwilling in such a time, to reject the virtue of any good Souldier, how meane soever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of eight thousand: and hee himselfe being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered up so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gave proofe of the difference betwene a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. He and his fellows were all (in a manner) slaine, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soon after this, Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fulvius a Roman Pretor with eighteen thousand men was in Apulia, very carelesse, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore hee hastened to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should have cut off those forces, that lay in the Provinces about, under men of small ability. Coming upon Fulvius, he found him and his men so jolly, that needs they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battell to Fulvius, he soone had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape alive; leaving all, save two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blowes, received the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Nevertheless, all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should goe substantially forwards with the siege of Capua: which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sat downe before the Town, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Army from Suessula, to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoever would issue out of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should have his pardon, and be suffered to enjoy all that unto him belonged : which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed up, they sent messengers to the Carthaginians; which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long journey, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundisium, upon advertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as bravely re-comforted. He bade them consider, how a few daies since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither againe, and send the Romans going as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned, and hardly could get back into the City; which the Romans had almost intrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted unto his friendship, would hold out a long time, and thereby give him leisure to do what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Army spent it selfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingered, and thereby gave the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilst he himselfe pursued hopes that never found successe.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua, retaining the same Armies as Proconsuls. The Town-men often sallied out; rather in a bravery, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans used to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skirmish. In these exercises the Campan usually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemy; who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore devised, that some active and courageous young men should learne to ride behind the Roman men at armes; leaping up, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion served. These were furnished like the Velites, having each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick upon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kinde of service, they much disheartened in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell upon their Camp. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could devise: setting all their multitude of unservicable people on the walls, which with a loud noyse of Pans and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the *Campan*s, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he drave them at length back into their City. Nevertheless, in pursuing them to their gates, He received a wound that accompanied him in short space after to his grave. Quintus Fulvius was held harder to his taske by Hannibal, and the Carthaginian Army. The Roman camp was even at point to have bin lost; and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slain upon it, fell into the ditch; & filled it up in such sort, that their bodies served as a bridge unto the Assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitives that could speak Latine well, to proclaim aloud as it were in the Consuls name, That every one of the Souldiers should thrust for himselfe, and flie betimes unto the next hills, forasmuch as the Campe was already lost. But all would not serve. The fraud was detected; and the Army having sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrenched it selfe, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-near lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum were to have bin much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater use: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, even to set upon Rome; and carry to the Wallies of that proud City, the danger of Warre that threatened Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one

one of them at least, unto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they divided their forces, then was it likely, that either he or the *Campan*s, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despair, that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His onely feare was, left the *Campan*s, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeeld themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtle Numidian: who running as a fugitive into the Roman Camp, conveyed himselfe thence over the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The journey to Rome was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good successe resting in the suddenesse of his arrivall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to have in a readinesse ten daies victuals; and prepared as many boates, as might in one night transport his Army over the River Fulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generals, by some fugitives, had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate; which was therewith affected, according to the diversity of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gave counsell to let alone Capua, yea, and all places else, rather than to put the Town of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being unable to relieve Capua, should judge himselfe strong enough to win Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serve the turn well enough, to keep him out, and send him thence, if he were so unwise as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius & Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred unto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to doe as they thought behoovefull: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, Quintus Fulvius took fifteen thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choice of his whole Army: with which he hastened toward Rome, leaving Appius Claudius, who could not travell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal having passed over Fulturnus, burnt up all his boates; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hastened he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than he needs must. Yet found he the Bridges over Liris broken downe by the people of Fregelle: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grievously to spoyle their lands, whilst the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him; driving the Country, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the City; some few bringing true advertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets and Temples in Rome were pestered with women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assembly; ready to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being uncertaine, upon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came newes that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was hastning to the defence of the City. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his returne home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by coming into the City in time of such need, an Act was passed, That hee should have equall power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soone after another: Fulvius having been long held occupied in passing over Fulturnus; and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Country was able to give. The Consuls, and Fulvius, incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; so took they more careful and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he advanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great way under the Wall, viewing the fire thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driven away, without doing or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. Above the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (upon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Aventine, to the Gate Colina, where it was thought that their service might be usefull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred such mistaking, as caused a great uproare among the people: all crying out that Aventine was taken; and the Enemy gotten within the Walls. The noyse was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of cartell, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoining, that the passage was stoped up: and the poore Numidians pitifully beaten from the house toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would have run out at the Gares, had it not bene certaine who lay under the Wall. To remedy the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all which had bene Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should have authority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed over Anien, and presented battle to the Romans, who did not wisely if they undertooke it. It is said, that a terrible shewre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their severall Camps: and that this happened two dayes together, the weather breaking up and clearing as soon as they were departed asunder: certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes provision, could not indure to stay there, until his victuals were all spent. In which regard the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well advised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parred (as is said) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great soever it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time the supply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipio's, was sent out of the Town, & went forth at the gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Punick terrours, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause known, or no cause answerable to the greatnesse of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedy to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such as men have fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarme themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they wist not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish uproare in his Army, by proclaiming a reward unto him that could tell who had sent the Asse into the Camp. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity: whereby they sustained their reputation, and augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seeme to have been diminished. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceits of their enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that feare, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay encamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had bin in time of peace. This indignity comming to his eare, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made sport-sale of the Silver-smiths shoppes, which were neare about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houses within the Towne were no white worke, than any Roman Citizens could be unto that piece of ground, whereon he sold his Tent. But this counter-practise was nothing worth. The Romans did seek to manifest that assurance which they justly had conceived; Hannibal, to make shew of contriving in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had proposed unto himselfe, this journey had brought forth none other, than the same of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake up his Campe: and doing what spoil he could of the Roman Territory, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a tempest over the Country, and ran toward the Easterne Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arrivall was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gave it lost: and is likely to have cursed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieve that faire City, since he had no other way to vent his griefe.

Q. Fulvius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who so would yeeld, before a certain day, might safely doe it. This, and the very returne of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to understand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans conscience of his owne evil defects, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was given, by Hanno and Boissar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if means could only be found, how to convey such Letters unto him as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken by some Numidians: who running as fugitives, out of the Towne into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their packers. But it hapned ere they could convey themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Town; and the Letters of Boissar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement intreaty unto Hannibal, that hee would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make Warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions, wheresoever they lye, there also should the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking of such course, have we gotten those victories at Trebia, Thesamene, and Canna. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promising to make a desperate sally, if he would once more adventure to set upon the Roman Campe. Such were the hopes of Boissar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best: and now beganne to faint under the burden of that Warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well bee, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had bin sent over by the Hannibals, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to checke his proceedings. If this were so, justly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessity. Howsoever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeit fugitives, as carried such messages, whipt them back into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Capuans, so that the multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble and consult, about the yeelding up of Capua unto the Romans. The bravest of the Senators, and such as a few years since, had bene most forward in joyning with Hannibal, understood well enough wherunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them such an health, as should fet them free from that cruel revenge, which the Enemies sought upon their bodies. About seven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their lives together, by drinking poyson. All the rest hoping for more mercy than they had deserved, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open; whereat a Roman Legion, with some other Companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman camp. At their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons upon them all; and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe custodie; some to Caler, others to Theanum. Touching the generall multitude, they were referred unto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly used by Fulvius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversity. Ap. Claudius was brought unto the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received: yet was he not inexorable to the Capuans; as having loved them well in former times, & having given his daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom we spake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more basty in taking vengeance: for feare, lest upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoove to fall to the common safety, and honour of their State. Wherefore he took the paines to ride by night unto Thebanum, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campans prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all townes of Italy the lesse apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campans: and bred a general inclination, to returne upon good conditions to the Roman side. The Astellans, Galatines and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very feare and want of ability to resist. They were therefore used with the like rigour, by Fulvius: who dealt so exactly with them all, that he brought them unto desperation. Wherefore some of their yong gentlemen, burning with fire of revenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the city was like to have bin consumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no casualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed unto any slave, and other sufficient reward casualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed unto any slave, and other sufficient reward casualty. Thus all came out; to any free man, that should discover who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out; and the Campans being detected by a slave of their owne (to whom, above his liberty promised, was given about the sum of an hundred markes) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their Walls: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become Suppliants unto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set unto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poore women in Capua (of which one had beene an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children sold for slaves; and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and referred to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day, and confined unto severall places, as best liked the angry victors. As for the towne of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beaurty and commodious site: but no corporation or forme of politie was allowed to be therein; onely a Roman Provost was every year sent to govern over those that should inhabit it; and to doe justice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present war. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dim light than before: his oyle being farre spent; and that which should have revived his flame, being unfortunately shed; as shall be told in place convenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia and Sicil, held War against the Romans 40 in those Islands, and were overcome.

W Hile things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia & Sicil by the Carthaginians & their friends, were brought to a quiet & happy end by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: above thirty thousand being up in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harficor with his son Hyofius, mighty men in that Island, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so careless, as in the rest of their maine undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had beene better if their care had been directed unto the prosecution of that maine business in Italy; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would have sufficed, if they could have hindered the Romans from sending an Army into Sardinia. Harficor with his followers might well enough have served to drive out Quintus Mutius the Prætor: who lay sicke in the Province; and not more weak in his owne body, than in his traine. But whilest they sought revenge of that particular injurie, whereof the sense was most grievous; they neglected the opportunity of requiring those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enter-enterprise was such, as may seeme to have encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent over Asdrubal, furnished the Bald, with a competent fleet and Armie; assisted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barbine house, and neerer kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet, by extremity of foule weather, was cast upon the Baleares; so beaten, and in such evil plight, that the Sardinians had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Island, which he had taken in, and annexed unto the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preserve and up-hold in their severall Provinces, the greatness and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Province had beene first subdued unto their Empire. If any injurie were done unto the Provincials, if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate, or whatsoever accident required the assistance of a Patron; the first Conquerour, and his race after him, were the most ready and best approved meanes, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence, in every Province, and had always in readinesse fit men to reclaim their Subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise have required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius retained in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harficor so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we have spoken before: he landed at Calariis, or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed up into the Countrey, and fought out the Enemy. Hyofius, the sonne of Harficor, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left unto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their side. This young gentleman would needs adventure to get honour, by giving battell to the Romans at his owne discretion. So he rashly adventured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and lost in one day above thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyofius himselfe, with the rest of his broken troups, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soon after this defeat came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians; too late to winne all Sardinia in such haste as he might have done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage: yet soone enough, and strong enough to save the Towne of Cornus; and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himselfe backe to Calariis: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his assistance; their Countrey being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refused to joyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calariis: where, if he had stayed a little longer, Asdrubal would have fought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Asdrubal and his company, appears to have bin greater than was their strength. For after some triall made of them in a few skirmishes, Manlius adventured all to the hazzard of a battell; wherein he slew twelve thousand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Four hours the battell lasted; and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had beene broken in their unprosperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of young Hyofius, and of his father Harficor, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captivity of Asdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornus; whither Manlius followed them, and in short space won the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yielded unto the Romans; who, imposing upon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best suited with the nature of their severall offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calariis with a great booty, & from thence to Rome, leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicil was of greater length, and every way more burdnesome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not onely saviors of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrey, by annexing the City and dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enjoyed before. Soon after

after the battell of Canna, the old King of Syracuse died; who had continued long a steadfast friend unto the Romans, and greatly relieved them in this present warre. He left his kingdom to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteen yeeres of age; Gelo his sonne, that should have bin his heire, being dead before. To this young King his successour, Hiero appointed fifteen tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preserve the kingdom, by the same art, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing wearie of so many coadjutors, began to commend the sufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeeres; and said, that he was able to rule the kingdom without help of any Protector. Thus, by giving over his owne charge, he caused others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands; which came to passe, in a sort, as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of government, gave himselfe wholly over to his pleasures: or, if he had any regard of his Royall dignity, it was onely in matter of exterior shew; as wearing a Diadem, with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people, that had never seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more he offended them, when by his insolent behaviour, suitable to his outward pompe, he gave proofe, that in course of life, he would revive the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. He grew proud, lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to live in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to avoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe. Onely Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraso continued in grace with him, and were his Counsellors, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoever they agreed in other points, were at some dissention about the maine point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was set on change: but Thraso, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilest as yet it remained somewhat doubtfull which way the King would incline, a conspiracie against his person was detected by a Groom of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end, unto the extremity of the torture, he confessed, that he had bene set on by Thraso; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were necere in love or place unto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and never shrunke for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremitie. Thus they all escaped, and soone after found meanes to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thraso was taken out of the way, quickly resolved upon siding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, love to seeme wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great needesse, had of late been such, as might have been termed excessive, were it not in regard of his providence; wherein he tooke order for his owne Estate, that depended upon theirs. But the young Nephew taking little heed of dangers farre off, regarded onely the things present; the weaknesse of Rome, the prevalent fortunes of Carthage, and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vaine, to shoulder up a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into such favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Prætor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betwene the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his Messengers were disinified with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needs have them tell him the order of the fight at Canna; that he might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe; saying, that he could hardly believe the Carthaginians;

so wonderfull was the victory as they reported it. Having thus disinified the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he should reigne over all Sicily; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied with what they could get in Italie. At these doings Appius Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoved not the Romans to entertaine more quarrels, than were enforced upon them by needesse; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had received such blemish, by that which hapned unto him in his journey, as much discountenanced him when he came into Sicily, and forbade him to looke bigger. The money that Hiero had bestowed formerly upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their needesse, this Appius was to tarry backe unto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater braverie than their present fortune would allow. But instead of returning the money with thanks, as he had bin directed, and as it had bin noised abroad that he should doe: the warre against Philip King of Macedon (whereof we have spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine glory, and send word after him, that he should consign that money over to Marcus Valerius; of whose voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwise wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimitie, into such a pitifull tune of thanksgiving, as must needs have bred forrow and commiseration in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of pastime and scorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilest Hieronymus was more desirous of war, than well resolved how to begin it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innovation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might have prospered more than ever, had it been wisely governed. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, were sent about the Countrie with two thousand men, to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fifteen thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a City of his owne Dominion: hoping that the same of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Sovereigne. There the Conspirators took him on the sudden, as he was passing through a narrow street: and rushing betwene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the sound of that word so joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus had little courage to revenge their Masters death. Yet, for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised unto the Souldiers, with rewards unto their Captaines; which wrought so effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up, the Armie, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carcasse to lie unburied. These newes ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking also of the Kings horses, posted away; to signifye all that had passed, to stirre up the people to libertie, and to prevent Andronodorus, if he or his fellows would make offer to usurpe a tyranny. The Syracusians hereupon presently tooke Armes, and made themselves masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace and the Island; being yet uncertaine what to doe: between desire of making himselfe a soveraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment as a Tyrant, if his enterprize mis-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well-knowne Proverbe, which Dionysius had used; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were baled out of it by the beeles, and not ride away from it on horse-backe. But feare, and better counsell, prevailed so farre, that Andronodorus, having slept upon the matter, disinified his affections, and deferred his hope unto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a speech unto the people; telling them, that he was glad to see, how prudently they behaved themselves in so great a change; that he had stood in feare, lest they would not have contained themselves within the bounds of discretion; but rather have sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that, since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to ravish their liberty perforce, but to wed it unto them for ever; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendered up the charge committed unto him, by one that had bin an

evill master both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made, and Prætors chosen (as in former times) to governe the Citie, of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Sovereignie, and so vehement were the infligations of his wife, that shortly he began to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himselfe strong by their helpe, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had bene with the Syracusian Prætors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilst he lived, what service they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed; and with a convoy, that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earne thanks of Hannibal, with such a little courtisie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple, which were good fouldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew; they were more mindfull of the businesse for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosomes of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themistius, that had married Harmonia, the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the rest of the Prætors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entering into the Senate, were slaine out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the evill which they had done, whilst Hieronymus lived, as by his authoritie; and now since attempted, in seeking to usurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessory to this dangerous treason: and that the unquiet spirits of these women would never cease to work, untill they had recovered those royall ornaments and Sovereigne power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were also condemned to die, and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata and Harmonia had perhaps deserved this heave sentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sofippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the hastie execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Sofippus was a lover of the Common-wealth; and in that respect loathed by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to King Ptolomie, &c. he durst not returne home, but stayed in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude, that (pardonning themselves) all cried out upon the Authors of so foule a butcherie. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger, they called for an election of new Prætors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not onely of the poorer Citizens; but of fouldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Prætor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the old Prætors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall crieforded them to be accepted. These being made Prætors did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betwene the Syracusians and the Romans. But having striven in vaine, and seeing that the people stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus that was lately come into Sicily; they gave way unto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garrison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Prætor, attended by such fugitives, and mercenary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to doe many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly & boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word unto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the the league; and that the peace would never be kept sincerely, untill this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides, fearing to sustain the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe unto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians. For he said, that since they had all of late served one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their streets the Tyrant was slaine, and liberty first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion over those that had broken the Chaine, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his advice was, that such their arrogance should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had bene subject to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be Vassals unto the State of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicides told them, that in this novelty of change, they had fit opportunitie to recover the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it unreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had bene subdued by the same hand, which tooke libertie from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yielded unto Syracuse, and bene subject unto that Citie, by what forme soever it was governed; this claime of libertie was rather seasonable, than just. Nevertheless, the motion of Epicides was highly approved: inso much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans, and to denounce unto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed, so that they stayed not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forthwith reported unto Marcellus by the Syracusians; who offered him their assistance in doing justice upon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with took the businesse in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault Leontium was taken, all save the Castle; whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled: and stealing thence away by night, conveyed themselves into the towne of Herbesius. The first thing that Marcellus did, when he had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captains used after victorie, to seek out the fugitive Roman slaves and renegado's, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Towns-men and Souldiers, he tooke to mercy, forbearing also to strip or spoyle them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrarie sort. It was said, that he had slaine Man, Woman, and Childe, and put the Towne to sacke. These newes met the Syracusian Army upon the way, as it was going to joine with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had bene sent forth of Syracuse, under Sofis and Dinomenes, two of the Prætors, to serve against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Country: but the Souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had bene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it best, to turne their unquiet thoughts another way, and set them to worke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their service. So towards Herbesius they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischief, devising what further harme they might doe; but now so weakly accompanied, that they seemed unable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore adventured upon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesius unarmed, with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Cree were in the vanguard; that that had bene well used by Hieronymus, and some of them greatly bound unto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and lovingly dismissed them. These Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheare, saying, That no man should doe them harme, as long as they could use their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this accident ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Prætors thought to help the matter by severity, which would not serve. For when they commanded these two traitors to be layd in Irons, the exclamation was so violent against them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne, uncertaine what course to take, unto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates devised a trick, whereby to help himselfe, and better the uncertaine case wherein he stood. He caused Letters, of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretians, directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusan Prætors to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines: but that it further behoved him, to make the like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensive, all of them in generall, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed, the uproare was such, that Sofis and his fellow Prætor, were glad to forsake the Campe, and flie for their lives. All the Syracusians remaining behinde, had bene cut in pieces by the enraged Souldiers, if the two Artificers of the sedition had not saved their lives; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischievous knave, that had served amongst the Leontines, to justifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witnesse. This incensed not onely the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole towne with causelesse indignation. In good time (said some) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would have dealt much worse, where their greedy appetites might have bene tempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilest they were thus discourting, and devising how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, unlesse for want of helpe, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Prætors, with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faine have kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong fury of those within the Town, that laboured to breake it open. So he entred, and immediately fell upon the Prætors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers untill night. The next day hee went openly to worke: and, after the common example of Tyrants, gave liberty unto all slaves and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himselfe and his brother Prætors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was advertised of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he neere with his Armie: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the Town, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Prætors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to doe hurt, but in favour of the Syracusians, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enjoy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be delivered up. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, that if their errand had bene to him, he could have told what to say to them: but since it was directed unto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the government in their hands. As for the warre which they threatened, he told them, they should finde by experience, That to besiege Syracuse was another manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee sent them gone; and returned backe into the Citie. Immediately began the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium, did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of wals as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terror in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Nevertheless all his labour was disappointed; & his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hastie victory. But there lived at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes, the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of Warre, as being in this extremity put in use, did more mischiefe to the Romans than could have bene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age bene knowne. This Archimedes discounting once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proofe of this bold assertion, he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to convert his studie unto things of use: that might preserve the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injury done unto the liberal Sciences, to submitt learned Propositions, unto the workmanship, and gaine, of base handi-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that seemed unto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly taske a man so wise Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For it hath bene the unhappy fate of great inventions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be under-valued; as falling within compass of the meanest wit; and things, that every one could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discoverie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he underwent before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent proofe. He that looks upon our English Brewers, and their Servants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any whit the lesse, for that the labour of workmanship growes to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may bee said of many handi-crafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being devised, and bettered, by great Scholars and wisemen, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily over, and feede their workmen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others that have, or would seeme to have any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good unto mankind; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of injustice, that the long travells of an understanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away upon men of no worth; yeeld lesse benefit unto the Author of a great worke, than to meere strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Envie have in it any thing allowable and naturall, as having Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serveth against those, which would usurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to induethem. Nevertheless, if we have regard unto common charity, and the great affection that every one ought to beare unto the generality of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his Summe to shine upon the just, and unjust: it will appeare more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish unto the world, those good things that lye buried in their owne bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning; that may bee perverted by evil men to a mischievous use. For if the secret of any rare Anidote, contained in it the skill of giving some deadly and irrecoverable poison: much better it were, that such a jewell remaine close in the hands of a wife and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to use the remedy, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiefe. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended unto very commendable ends. They were Engines, serving unto the defence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to use them; but reserved so much to his owne direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed unto this worthy man, that he had approved unto the vulgar, the dignity of his Science; and done especiall benefit to his Country. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wal. Against these Archimedes had sundrie devices; of which any one fort might have repelled the assailants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicity of his great wit. He shot heavey stones & long pieces of timber, like unto the yards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come neerer the wals, lay open to a continuall volly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoysted up, shaking out all the men, and afterwards falling downe into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted up into the ayre, where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls or cast upon the rocks: and all of them were so beaten that they durst never come to any second assault. In the like fort was the Land armie handled. Stones and timber, falling upon it like haile, did not onely over-whelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the assault. For remedy hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day get neere unto the walls; they should be (as it were) under the point blanke, and receive no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were woond up hard to shoot a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the assailants lives: For the shot came downe right upon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were unable to tarry by it) even till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrefie the Romans, that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, upon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare, against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood upon the wals, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by some device, to make them unserviceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streetes behinde the walls; where Archimedes gave directions how to use them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Town all provision of victuals, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very desperate peece of worke. For the enemies having so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely so soone to be consumed with famine, as the besiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, having no probability to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admiral of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates advertised of these passages, went home to Carthage and there so dealt with the Senate, that five and twenty thousand Foot, three thousand Horse, and twelve Elephants, were committed unto his charge, wherewith to make warre upon the Romans in Sicily by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many that had anciently belonged unto the Carthaginians, did yeeld unto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne unto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He tooke Pelorum and Herbesus, which yeelded unto him. He tooke also Megara by force and fact: it either to terrefie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Army must have somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to have saved Agriumentum: whither he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned backe toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he used, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse unto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, horse, intending to joyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell upon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victorie against the disperfed and halfe unarmed Syracusians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, joyning with Hippocrates, ranne over all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battaile to Marcellus, even at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilear also a Carthaginian, entered with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed to againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arrived at Marcellus his Campe: yet many places revolted unto the Carthaginians, and slew or betrayed the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leaving some of his Armie before Syracuse, that hee might not seeme to have given over the siege, went unto Leonium, where he lay intente to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turn all his forces to Agriumentum against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as unable to prevaile: & he himselfe was of an eager disposition, ever unwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not feisible, an enterprize that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; & no likelihood to take the City by force or famine; yet was he not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially he assaied to prevaile by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusian Gentlemen that were in his Campe; exhorting them to practise with their friends that remained in the City. This was not easie for them to doe, because the Towne would hearken to no parlee. At length a slave unto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where hee talked in private with some few, as hee had beene instructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the City: whence the Conspirators used to send him advertisement of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of foure score, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discovered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damaspippus a Lacedaemonian, that had been sent out of the Towne as an Embassador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking upon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometric, fell to numbring the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, judged it lesse than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place; and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it; made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therefore the most strongly guarded: neither was there hope to prevaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surpris. But a fugitive out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to be held unto Diana, which was to last three daies: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunity could not bee wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festivall night, came unto the walls, which he took by Scaloda. Syracuse was divided into foure parts (or five, if Eppole were reckoned as one) each 10 of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peeces, he had the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunity than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradinia & the Island, inner parts of the Town, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken unto composition, as being much terrefied by the losse of those parts, which the Romans had taken and sacked. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, unto those that were sheltered under strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether unfurnished of his helpe; since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegado's, were more carefull than ever to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with cruell death, if Marcellus could prevaile. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; & Bomilcar was lent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates sallied out of Acradina who fell upon the old Camp of the Romans, whilst Epicides sallied out of Acradina upon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Assailants were repelled. Nevertheless, they continued to beset the Towne. But the pestilence at ner as streightly besieged, as he himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Captains, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat lesse) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to doe his Countre service: but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid; being loth to double the Cape; for that the windes did better serve the enemy than him. Thither sailed Epicides out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, he stood off into the deepe; and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durst not Epicides returne into Syracuse, but went to Agigentum: where he expected the issue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian Souldiers that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as neere as they could safely, unto Marcellus, and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could unto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicil was given as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Town. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gave care: for he had staid there long enough; and had cause to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their liberty and proper lawes; yet suffering the Romans to possess whatsoever had belonged unto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Prætors chosen; and the gates even ready to be opened unto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitives disturbed all. These perceiving their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercenarie Souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themselves, and betrayed the Army to the Romans. Wherefore they presently tooke Armes, and fell upon the new chosen Prætors; whom they slew, and made election of fixe Captaines that should command over all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting onely the fugitives. The Treatie was therefore againe set on foote, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delayed; either by some feare of the Citizens, that Agigentum had seene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman avarice in the sack of Epiro, Tybe, & Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might use the liberty of a Conqueror, & make it wholly subject to Rome.

Merim a Spaniard was one of the fixe Captaines, that had been chosen in the last commotion: a man of such faith, as usually is found in Mercenaries; holding his owne particular benefit above all other respects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: having a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes, that went in company with the Romane Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This craftie Agent perswaded Merim, That the Romans had already gotten all Spaine: and that if ever he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where else; it was now the onely time to do it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanishe Captaine was easily won, and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusan Embassadors to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had bene such, as deserved not to be requited with the ruine of his Countre: much lesse, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Army of Mercenaries, should minister unto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired fouldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld unto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Army. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had bene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately slaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also bene slaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire unto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rafcalie, and some ill advised persons, joyned with the fouldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium; and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne City which was taken? Ought therefore the Romane Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargain under-hand against them, with a Captaine of the Mercenaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, & promise of good usage in time to come; than to restore the booty, and give over the Dominion of a City, so great, wealthy, strong, and many ways important. Nevertheless if we consider the many inconveniences and great mischiefs whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious, both by evil neighbours, and by that very forme of policie, after which it was governed: wee may truly affirme, That it received no small benefit, by becoming subject unto Rome. For thereby it was not onely assured against all forraigne enemies, domestickall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of olde had reigned therein: but freed from the necessitie of banishing, or murdering, the most worthy Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the jealousie, wherein they held their liberty in vaine. Neither enjoyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serves not to make injustice the more excusable: unless we should approve the answer of that Thiefe, who being found to have stolen a silver cup from a sicke man, said, Hee never leaves drinking.

By the treatie of Merim, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein, the booty that it found, was said to have bin no lesse, than could be hoped for; if they had taken Carthage it selfe; that maintained war by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly workes and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was marvellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched; save onely the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, even by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busie about his Geometrie, in drawing figures; that he harkened not to the noyse, and uprore in the City; nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus tooke heavily the death of him; and caused his body to be honourably buried. Upon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere; with an inscription of the proportion betwene them; which he first found out. An Invention of so little use, as this may seeme, pleased that great Artist better, than the devising of all those engines; that made him so famous. Such difference is in the judgement of learned men; and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would thinke the monie lost; that had bin spent upon a sonne, whose studies in the Univerfity had brought forth such fruit; as the proportion betwene a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicil yeelded unto the Romans, except Agigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agigentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, & Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good peeces of service, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and whichall made his owne name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides adventured to meet Marcellus without the Towne; and not behave themselves as men expecting to bee besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set upon the Romanes; where they lay encamped, and drove them fearefully into their Trenches. This bred envie in Epicides & Hanno; especially in Hanno, that that having beene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had sent unto him this Muines, to be his Companion, & to take upon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignity seemed the greater, when Muines being to step aside unto Heraclea, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; advised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemy, untill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: & offered battell unto Marcellus, before he fought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoever disproportion was betweene the two Armies; farre greater were the odds betweene the Capraines. For howsoever the people of Carthage would give authority by favour; yet could they not give worth and ability, in matter of warre. The Numidians, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captains: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine-glorious envie of Hanno carried him unto the fight, upon a foolish desire to get victory, without the helpe of Muines their Countreiman. Wherefore they sent unto the Roman General, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but only looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did lustily set upon the enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, drove them backe into Aggrigentum.

If Hanno could have beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of Warre than himselfe; and not have hazzarded a battell without need; the Romans would shortly have beene reduced into termes of great difficulty in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leave the Province; and loone upon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foote, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Army consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, tooke it very haينously, that no good service done, could bring them into the favour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, and not suffered to returne back to Rome with their Generall. Muines had pacified his countreimen the Numidians; & like an honest man, did what he could for those whom he served, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have beene, if the Army lately overthrowne had beene entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Prætor, used all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those In-land Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Muines from over-running all the Countrey; yet he hindered the Countrey from revoking unto Muines. Above three score Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicily: of which Aggrigentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Muines as often as hee pleased, in despite of the Romanes: not onely to the succour of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrary part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good services, was filled more and more with envie, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) received instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have share in the honour of these Sicilian Warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilst Italy was neglected; that should have beene regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint unto him an Assistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Muines his charge, and gave it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed; as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spitefull dealing occasioned the losse of whatsoever the Carthaginians held in Sicily. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignity offered unto their Countreiman, being such a brave Commander, that they offered him their service to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Levinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Muines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these these indignities; but being neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage: He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his own game, and forsake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the evil counsell that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Countreimen had lately done, content himselfe to see his Adversaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious over-weening; and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliver up Aggrigentum, and to helpe to expell them utterly out of Sicily. The Consull was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his advertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Muines had undertaken: For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize upon a gate; whereas they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noise, thought it had beene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Muines, forthwith he betooke himselfe to flight: and saving himselfe, with Epicides, in a small Barke, set saile for Africke; leaving all his Army and Adherents in Sicily, to the mercie of the Romans; that henceforward continued matters of the whole Iland.

Levinus the Consul having taken Aggrigentum, did sharpe execution of justice upon all the Citizens. The principall of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the maner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaves, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the money that was raised of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessity of gold, than of Steele: which may have been the reason, why Levinus dealt so cruelly with the Aggrigentines. Nevertheless the fame of such severity bred a terroure among all the Dependents of the Carthaginians, so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About forty Townes yielded themselves quickly unto the Romans; twenty were delivered up by Treason; and fixe onely stayed to be wonne by force. These things done, Levinus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agatirna; that were a company of out-laws, bankrouns, and banished men, accustomed to live by spoile of others, in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their own occupation against the Brutians; a theevish kinde of people, that were enemies unto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Muines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipios in their journey against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especiall service. So by this enterprize of Sicily, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have beene employed in Italy: leaving yet unto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victory at Metawrum.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good services done in the Iland of Sicily, he had granted unto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because hee had not finished the warre, but was faine to leave his Army behinde him in the Province. He staid not long in Rome, before he was againe chosen Consull together with M. Valerius Levinus, who succeeded him in the government of Sicily, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consull Marcellus, by the *Syracusan*s, for that which he had done unto them: they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their City did never willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome than to all good men that lived in Syracuse. The Consull, on the other side, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to becomae themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessity; and not unto the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part having some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controversie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subjection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopefull promises, as hath bene shewed before. The two new Consuls Marcellus and Lavinus, were appointed to make war, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italy, the other in Sicil. The Isle of Sicil fell unto Marcellus; which Province he willingly changed with his Collegue; so to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet bene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindred by feare, from uttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his businesse with them was dispatcht, he gently undertooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie, to the great benefit of their Countrey in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicil, whose doings there have been already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Souldiers to the war, and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Navie. They were all of the poorer sort, that used to be employed in Sea-services, especially in rowing. These could not live without present wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treasure to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should bee let out at the expence of private men; who in this necessity of the State, were driven to sustaine all publike charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into sedition, had not the Consuls deferred the matter unto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of such extremity. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could undergoe; and somewhat more, than could with honesty have been imposed upon it. Nevertheless it was impossible to maintaine the war against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italy, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That, since the common Treasure was so empty, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden upon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no persuasions would be so effectual with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was, that the people also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasure, all the money that he had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoever; excepting one Salt-seller, and a Bowle wherewith to make their offerings unto the gods; as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as every one did use, and those of as small value as might be. This advice of the Consuls was not more thankefully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuse to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publike necessity could no otherwise be holpen; every one was contented, that his private estate should run the same fortune with the Common-wealth, which if it suffered wracke, in vaine could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimitie deserved well that greatnesse of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Army and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the City against Hannibal; & Lavinus toward Sicil. The army of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard service: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke upon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the losse of Capua: which gave them cause to looke unto themselves; as if in his helpe there were little trust to be repowed, when they should stand in neede. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his Armie, that he should not be able to keepe the field: or else he must leave them to their owne fidelity, which now began to waver. At length his jealousie grew so outrageous, that he sacked, and wasted those places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe; and make unprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The Towne of Salapia yielded unto Marcellus; and betrayed unto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that served under Hannibal; which was a greater losse, than the Town it selfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Dafus, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dafus in private; and was by him accused unto Hannibal. But when he was convicted and charged of Treason, hee so stoutly denied it; and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter devised out of meere malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his adversarie anew, and urge him from time to time, with such lively reasons; that he who could not be beleevd by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the favour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul took by force, Maronea and Meles, Towns of the Sammies; wherein he slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than he. The best was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themselves with ill speede in many petty enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italy, to follow businesse of far lesse importance; had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply, that had bene so long promised & expected. This if they had done in better season; Rome it selfe might have beene stricken down, the next year after that great blow received at Canna. But since that which is past cannot bee amended; Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty succour would come time enough. For Masaniissa was at Carthage with five thousand Numidians, ready to set saile for Spain; whither when he came, it was appointed that Asdrubal should forthwith take his journey into Italy, of which there had bene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal & his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best; the Romans to prevent the threatening mischief, and winne as much as they could upon Hannibal, before the coming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Prator, lay neere unto Herdonea to get the Towne by practice. It was not long, since neere unto the same place, another Cn. Fulvius had lost his Army. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; & came to Herdonea ere Fulvius heard news of his approach. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Prator; who accepted it with more haste than good speede. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rout; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himselfe, with twelve Tribunes or Coronels, were lost: of the common Souldiers, that were slaine, the number is uncertaine; some reporting seven, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdonea, because it was at point to have yielded unto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire; and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carried away the multitude; whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: & exhorted them to be of a good cheere; for that hee would shortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian apace; and overtaking him at Numistro in the Countrey of the Lucans, fought with him a battell: which beginning at nine of the clocke in the morning, lasted untill night; & ended, by reason of the darkenes, with uncertaine victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Fennsia they met, & had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and fought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon faire ground.

Thus passed the time away, untill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Romans affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeere to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good City would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Collegue, and Masaniissa, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that served under him the yeer before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might have no leisure to helpe

Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannusum, and thence from place to place: desiring ever to come to battaile, but upon equall termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Army strong untill the coming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not avoide the importunity of Marcellus, nor brooke the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bade his men to be lusty, and to beat foundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would never suffer them to be at quiet; untill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile; wherein Hannibal had the victory: tooke fixe Ensignes, 10 & slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rared his men, as Pesants, and bafe cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stratageme. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, he did so vex them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall; they besought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies foremost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victory; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their 20 shamefull overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight againe; since all other motives continued the same, and his men had beene hartned by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred up with desire of revenge, & of repairing their honor lost, which afflictions gave a sharpe edge unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at so deare a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, 30 than even to recompence the late received overthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Nevertheless: it sufficed, that Fabius the Consull hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Consull, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volscians, that willingly yellected themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fulvius entertained in loving sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had beene authours, or busie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian thieves, which Levinus had lately brought from Agaturna, was then also set on worke to besiege Caulonia, a Towne of the Brutians; 40 and nothing was omitted, that might serve to divert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consull, having taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, sate downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in love with a Tarentine wench; whose brother served under Fabius. Hereof, she gave notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her lover was. But her brother made the Consull acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in love, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreaty of his Mistis, to doe what he would have him. The Consull hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to convey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne persuasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister, wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the businesse, and resolved how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consull with his proceedings: telling him in which part 48 that that Brutian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarm to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Capitaines in the Towne, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get up, and brake open the next gate, whereat the Armie was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian Souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapeneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democritus, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, 10 used now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Caribalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well used, because of hospitalitie that had passed between his Father and the Consull. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutian, was thought to have beene made by appointment of the Consull, to the end that he might seeme to have wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum 20 was very great: whereof the Roman Treasurie, which it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carried away, becuing very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let us leave unto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell upon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a hill, which served to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yellected. When this businesse was done, he 30 hasted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans have also their Hannibal; we have lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne backe amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Consull; he incamped a few dayes together, so neere as he was unto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie; who did their errand so well, that the Consull wrote backe by them unto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure made ready his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were given; or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrefied the superstitious Roman; the journey to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed againe: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discovered all.

This yeere was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got every where, save onely at Caulonia; where they lost a company of such lewd fellows, that it may seeme good fortune, to have so been rid of them. But their common poverty, & disability to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italy: of which, twelve refused to contribute any longer to the Wars. For it was considered; that the Legions of Cannae, and those unhappy Companies that had beene beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were transported into Sicily; where they lived, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had beene exhausted with levies of men, and impositions of money: in every of which yeeres they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best that they could hope; was to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes 48

homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should be all confined: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones never returned. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelve, That they should boldly deny unto the Romans their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Townes make such declaration, and protest their disability of giving any farther helpe; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to returne home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campians or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serve: the Embassadors continuing to protest; that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other twelven Colonies did not imitate these twelve; but shewed themselves willing to undergoe whatsoever should be layed upon them, without shrinking under the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithful Colonies, were brought unto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commendation of all their former good services, this their present love unto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed upon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelve Colonies, that refused to contribute, it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisse them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their owne consideration of their illbehaving.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve people would have wrought in those that were so willing to help the State, if Asdrubal had been then coming into Italy. For then must the Romans have beraken themselves wholly to their owne defence: whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italy, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Nevertheless, they were faine to open their most privet treasure; and thence take out the gold that had beene layed up to serve them in cases of greatest extremity. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Army; and to provide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before: But to stop the journey of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Nevertheless it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this yeere, and the next were spent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could have beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessity of money, were driven to furnish the African Spain, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was farre lesse than Fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoever Livie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soon after his arrivall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, & T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius: In their yeere it was, that Asdrubal tooke his journey out of Spain, though he came not into Italy until the yeere following. After the great battaile at Cannæ, Hannibal had lost much time about Cannæ and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good haven, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italy; where he made ready a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if he had been ready to come. But since his hope was vanisshed, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later than had bene expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deale with the people of Herraria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein he might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, & many other Townes, might have terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from barking to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, & the weariness of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army coming than that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Arretines, to take such counsell as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Herraria: whose coming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeare following they were devising how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors, partly by terrour of severe judgments and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills, and tooke many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong Warre upon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battell they should bee too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the Winning of some good Towne: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri, one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy; and brought thither all sorts of engines, sending for a Fleet out of Sicily to helpe him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieve the City: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprife, and retire unto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal, to whom the Consuls daily offered battell. This great man of Warre had no need to stand upon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed unto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some advantage; reserving his owne numbers as full as he could, unto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of War, Marcellus tooke no pleasure: but sought to compell the Enemy to battell, whether he would or no. The Admirall of the Roman Fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded again to assaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay at Tarentum, was appointed to go by land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behind him. He laid an ambush in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, wherinto the Romans fell: and having lost above three thousand of their Company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprife, and save their owne lives within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal to waste their Army by little and little: which to doe, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hill, over-grown with wood, that seemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undiscerned, might fall upon such as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keep themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground the Consuls thought it fit to remove their Camp: Marcellus thinking that he never lay near enough unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principall men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellows who discovered not themselves, until they had surrounded the Consuls and their train. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves hoping to be quickly relieved from their Campe that was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than forty horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregellæ. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls, and did what they could to have brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then began every one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe: The rest of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slain or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, covered it with a crown of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was false into the custody of Hannibal; vvhio might use it to his owne purposes, ere that vvhich had hapned vvere vvel known abroad. Wherefore he sent vvvord unto all the Towns about; that his Colleague was slain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: vvvishing them in that regard, to give no credit unto any letters therewithall signed. This providence of Crispinus was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, vvhen another Messenger arrived there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captive Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night unto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employ-¹⁰ment as he should thinke needfull. The device was plaine, and no lesse plaine was the revengefull mind which he bare against that City; because of his brave Numidian companies that had therein been betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their enemy in his own snare. They sent back the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitive, without letting him perceive any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the vvvay. These all talking Latine together, called unto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened faire and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawup no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But vvhen fixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themselves; being laid at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus over-reached vvith this stratageme, hasted away to Locri; where unto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicily, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcursors, made the Romans in all confused haste, run to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsoever was in their Campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent unto Crispinus the surviving Consul, & requested him to name a Dictator that might take charge of the Common-wealth,³⁰ and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, vvith other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soon after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so neare unto the Enemy, vvithout any Generall. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men as vvere not onely valiant, but vvell advised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himselfe so strangely, had given them a faire warning, not to commit their Army unto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobility, a good Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present War, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one,⁴⁰ whose temper needed the allay of a more stayed wit. The fathers therefore endeavoured to joine unto him in the Consulship, M. Livius: one that had borne the same Office long before. This M. Livius had been Consul vvith L. Aemilius Paulus, in the yeare foregoing the beginning of this Warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good service, they had both of them been called into judgement by the People: and this Livius condemned; Aemilius hardly escaping. Though it hath bene once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it againe: how it pleased God to upbraid the unthankfull Romans, vvith the malicious judgement, given by their multitude upon honourable men. For in the battell of Canna, it was apparent, what lamentable effects the memory of their injustice wrought: vvhen L. Aemilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest overthrow that ever fell upon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courtes of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew upon the danger of the popular fury. As for M. Livius, he is even now ready, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in aduers manner. Eight years together after his condemnation, had he been absent out of the City, and lived in his Country Grange; still vexing himselfe vvith the indignity of his condemnation. Marcellus and Levinus, being Consuls two or three yeares agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he lived private in discontented sort, as might appear,^{both} both by his carelesnesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very rarely he was compelled by the Censors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where he used to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dislike to what was proposed, either in short formal words, or in passing from side to side, vvhen the house was divided. At length it hapned, that in some businesse weightily concerning one that was his kinsman, he stood up and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had bene. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many brave men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather served to fill up the number, than to answer to the dignity of the place: and they that were left¹⁰ of ancient standing, had even spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore all began to say; that it was great pity, so worthy and able a man as this Livius, had been all this while forgotten; one of vvhom the Common-wealth stood in great need, yet had not used in this dangerous warre. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessity a Plébeian: and since neither Fabius, nor Valerius Levinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned vvith Claudius Nero: every one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two sifter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livius would not endure to heare of this. He said it was unreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to trust him vvith one Consulship, vvhat meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases he resisted their desires: till by perswasions, and examples reheard, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the people, and repaid good for evil; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, vvith which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughes vvhere of men breake in faire weather; but run under it for shelter in a storme. Such unthankfulnessse, to well-deserving men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much unlike, of Philip the second King of³⁰ Spaine his dealing vvith the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, upon some small offence conceived, vvithout all regard of his former deserts: yet vvhen his intended conquest of Portugal, required the service of a man, more than ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer upon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, vvhom he had newly disgraced. Thus is vvifedome often taught by necessity.

It was a dangerous yeare toward, vvhen C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius were chosen Consuls. Asdrubal was already come into France, and waited onely, to have the wayes of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans used at this time the service of three and twenty Legions: and vvanted not employment for many⁴⁰ more, if they had knowne how to levie and maintaine them. Of these vvich they had, foure served in Spaine, two in Sicily, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in severall parts of Italy, vvhere need seemed to require, that onely two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution: and vvould not be tyed to the punctuall observance of vvhat the Senate thought fit. M. Livius vvould not stirre out of Rome, against so mighty a power as followed Asdrubal, untill he had first obtained, that he might carry vvith him as many as could well be spared from other employments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serve under Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yeare, among the Cisalpine Gauls, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Livius; to vvhom the War against⁵⁰ Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentine, neare unto Tarentum, under another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Army, that was sent against Hannibal. Nevertheless, the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Livie, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Asdrubal was already passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, vvho dwell in the Countrey about Genua, vvith their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to joine vvith him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he vvould adventure no further, than he safely might. Vvhen all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each his severall way. The people of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, affected than they had beene, when L. Aemilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take upon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes : but rather they stood in feare, left all diligence, wisdom and valour should prove too little. For since few years had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not been slaine ; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst ; the two Carthaginians would forthwith joyne, and make short worke with the other : it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victors ; and come off with honour, from such mighty opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreme difficulty had Rome held up her head, ever since the battell of Cannæ : though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the War in Italy. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilcar ; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed a man of more sufficiency than Hannibal himselfe. For whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, over great Rivers and Mountains, that were thought unpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie : this Asdrubal in the same places, had multiplied his numbers ; and gathering the people, that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, farre greater than he came over the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spain. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many unto them ; caused the people of Rome, to wait upon their Consuls out of the Towne, like a penfive traine of Mourners : so thinking upon Marcellus and Crispinus, upon whom in the like sort they had given attendance the last year ; but saw neither of them returne alive, from a lesse dangerous Warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gave his accustomed advice to M. Livius, that he should abstaine from giving, or taking battell, untill he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, That he would fight the very first day : for that he thought it long, till he should either recover his honour by victory ; or by seeing the overthrow of his owne unjust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the joy of a great, though not an honest revenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Asdrubal received in Spain by Scipio, a little before he took his journey into Italy ; such mention hath already been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Livie. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his History concerning that accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spain ; by reason of those Capitaines that were sent from the City of Carthage, to joyne with him in the administration of that Province : they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction ; which is to say, thus farre forth Traytors, that they preferred the advantage of their own side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courses undertaken, it cannot be knowne : since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to us remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the spitefull dealing of Hanno in Sicily ; Mutines, a better man of Warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Island : we may conceive, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischievous Partizans of Hanno, to use the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Nevertheless, Asdrubal was a good Patriot : and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could not long digest. His journey into Italy being resolved upon : he lay with part of the Army at Beula, not farre from the Mines of silver ; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thither came Scipio : and drave him out of his Campe, though hee were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Capitaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The overthrow seemes not to have beene so great, as it must have beene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appears, that Asdrubal dealt like a provident man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced sent away all his money with his Elephants before him : but staid behind himselfe to sustaine the Romans a while, untill his carriages might be out of danger. Merely he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together : and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed over Togus. Then taking unto him the forces assigned for his expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees : leaving the care of Spain unto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the

the sonne of Gisco ; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio have stopped him on his journey, by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Asdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly sorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Comming into Saule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal : he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his money, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made ; but he, and his Armie well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choyce : for that he was driven to winter in their Country ; whilst that the passages of the Alpes were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his journey over the Alpes, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he travelled thorow their Country. For these poor men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily persuaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattell ; and to make spoile of that little wealth which they had painefully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in procieffe of time, they were better informed. Therefore understanding, that there were two mighty Cities, farre disjoynd asunder, which made Warre upon each other, by Land and Sea ; and that the Alpes did onely lye in the way : they gladly consented to take their part in the fortune of the Invaders. The last affliction upon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gauls. The Ligurians also joynd with Asdrubal : and so would the Helvrians have done, if he had arrived in their Country. There was no other Roman Armie neare, than L. Porcius with his two Legions ; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set upon Placentia, a Roman Colonie : in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there he lost a great deale of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise : by undertaking which, he gave the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him ; and caused his brother Hannibal (who upon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leave his wintering Campes, and goe forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speed he could to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from joyning with his brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and five hundred horse : with which he daily offered battel to the Carthaginians ; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Country of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces ; which were otherwise too weak for the journey intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans ; he there fought unprosperously with Nero the Consul. Nevertheless, he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him, and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to returne to Metapontum : where joyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he assayed againe, to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Venusia, having Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he over the River Asidus, to Cannusum, where he fate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit downe by him : and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps unto Hannibal, who knew the Country very vvell ; that his brother might with little impediment, overcome the vvvay to Cannusum : vvhere if he could once againe deale vvith both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once he had gotten in the same open Country. If this had so fallne out ; Rome vvould have beene undone for ever. But the Carthaginians should not have needed to vvith any second victory, in the naked Campans about Canna ; if such an Army as this vvich Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, vvhen he vvvas in his full strength ; and the Romans not able to keep the field. Wherefore this vvorthy General had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno vvvas the man, vvho by delaying the supply, did beate him out of Italy ; vvich esse no power of the Romans could have done.

Whilst Nero vvaited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting vvith the Army that vvvas comming to their succour : he vvvas advertised of fell by the means of those Captaines that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to have performed in this last battell all duties of a worthy General; and finally, when he saw the losse irreparable, to have ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where, fighting bravely, he was slain. Of the number that died with him in this battell, the report of Livie, and of Polybius doe very much disagree. For Livie saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an overthrow, than was that which they gave to the Romans at Cannae; that fiftie fixe thousand of them were slain, five thousand and four hundred taken prisoners, and above foure thousand Roman citizens, whom they had captives with them, delivered, and set at libertie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slain eight thousand: and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kinds, but in gold and silver. Concerning the bootie, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to have bin as rich as Livie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well stored with money. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battell of Metaurus, a parallel unto that of Cannae) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Roman, to have bin slain. The number of the prisoners he doth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all the rest died in the battell. Whereby it may seem that they were all Barchines: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their country, above their lives.

The joy of this victory was no lesse in Rome, than had bin the feare of the event. For ever since it was knowne in what sort Nero had left his Army, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consull should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces unto hazzard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure, and either pursue him, or set upon the Army that staid behind, much weakened, and without a General? Thus did they talk; yet reserving their censure unto the success; with liberty to approve or condemne, according to the issue. In the mean time the people filled the Market-place, the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsell, waiting still ready at hand upon the Magistrates, as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would aske every ones help. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when the first newes of victory came, there were not many that would believe it. Afterwards, when Messengers arrived from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed, there was not onely great and joyfull concourse of all sorts of men unto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their private businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to do) and attending their own affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italy.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians; and producing his African prisoners bound, sent two of them loose to give Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might have served well enough to certifie Hannibal of the mis-adventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and faire different manner, had given buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea, to all the Roman Generals, whose carcases fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love unto the Common-weale: yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more civill, and lesse prone to the insolency of revenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That hee forgot himselfe, being so over-joyed with the greatness of his prosperity. For it was the battell of Metaurus that weighed downe the balance, and turned the Tide of the Roman Fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not bee contained within any banks. Hannibal having lost in this unhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italy, with-drew himselfe into the Country of the Brutians; and thither he caused all the Lucans, that were of his partie, to remove; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For hee wanted men to defend so many places as he held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Where-

Wherefore he drew them all into a lesse compasse in the utmost corner of Italy, it being a country of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly devoted to his service. In this businesse Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, having all his forces united; or because it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harvest was gathered in: at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius the other Consull tarried among the Cisalpine Gauls until the end of summer; there to set things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote unto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Province, but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, he desired leave to returne home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well understood his meaning: which was, to have the honour of triumph, as he well deserved. But forasmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late victory: order was given, that not onely Livie with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero, though leaving his Armie behind him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof, Livie made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Province, and upon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Armie also being present at the triumph. But Nero, that rode on horse-backe, and without such attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victory was in a manner wholly ascribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Vaurim Philo, and Q. Cassius Maellus, Lieutenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgement of their good service. For they were commended unto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls: and Consuls they were chosen for the yeere following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Consulship. Neither indeed from this yeere, which was the thirteenth of the present warre, until the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; save only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surprise. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him, that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himselfe upright. And surely, very notable are the commendations given unto him by Polybius, whom Livie therein followes: That making war upon a People, of all other the most warlike, he obtained so many victories by his own good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded of so many sundry nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians, &c. Greeks, which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they never fell to sedition among themselves, or against their General. But that which Livie adds hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, upon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, vvhhen it was best matured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Asdrubal, hee made no invasion upon the vvealthier parts of Italy; but held himselfe still among the poor Brutians. Where vve must leave him, until he be drawn into Africa by Scipio; vvhose doings vwill henceforth entertaine, and lead us unto the end of this War.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman made entire conquest of Spain.

†. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

Mago and Asdrubal the son of Gesco, took upon them the charge of Spain, when Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italy. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voyage to the Baleares; there to levie a supply of men;

Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly; and gave not over, till they had forced the enemy to change his place, and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to have made an orderly retreat; and afterward againe, to have caused his men turn head at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victory to be so extorted from them: neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished, led by the obstinate passion of feare, which hearkens to no perswasion. The Camp of Asdrubal had that day bin taken, if a storm of rain, which fell violently on the sudden, and bred some superfluous in the Romans, had not caused them to give over.

The same night Asdrubal gave no rest to his men: but caused them, hungry and over-laboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he have in the strength of his Trenches, when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Ananes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subjects: many followed this example; and soone after two strong Townes were yielded up to Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seems that the perverse fortune of this late battell, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleve the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away faster than an ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and overtaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, save onely seven thousand that with Asdrubal himself recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. The place he made shift a while to defend: but wanting there necessaries to sustain himself long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolved to make shift for one; and stealing from his Company by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence, he tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio understood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masani staid in it) whilst he with the rest of the Army did what was needfull in the Countre abroad. It was not long ere Mago and Masani followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it selfe; some flying over to the Romans, others taking what way they liked. So upon all the Continent of Spaine, there were only three Towns left, Illurgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of war against the Romans: of which only Castulo had a Carthaginian garrison, consisting of such as had saved themselves by flight in the late overthrowes. Hereby it seems, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yielded long since unto the Romans; though Hannibal took a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three townes that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illurgi had sometimes bin inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune, it not only rebelled, but with great cruelty betrayed and slue the poor men that escaped thither from the overthrowes. Astapa was a town that still adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thriven by the spoyle of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not untill the next year) Scipio went against these, and tooke himselfe Illurgi and Castulo: Illurgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcium; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: whereinto was thrown all the gold, and silver, with whatsoever else was precious; the women and children standing by it under a sure guard, that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Town. So this provision being made, all the Inhabitants that could beare Armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell upon the Roman Camp; where striving beyond their power, they vvere every one slain. Then vvas the Town forth-vvith set on fire, by those that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans consumed with the flame; vvhist they rushed over-hastily to catch the gold and silver, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal being beaten into the Island of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, vvith seven Gallies: leaving Mago behind him, to vvait upon occasion, occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax, King of the Mae-sili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his evil Angel, in the Kings port: who landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio having driven the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forth-with bethink himself, how to finish the War, by putting them to the like distresse in Africk. Hereunto it seemed that the help of Syphax would be much available: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moved to seek revenge. He had also bin beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him over a Caprain into Africk, who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Upon these reasons, the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the city in time of great extremity. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the War, which he intended in Africk, upon the friendship of this ill neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent over C. La-bus his Embassador, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did verily ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine, easily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treaty. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not far distant from Spaine, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he took Sea, and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time with Asdrubal. This would have been very dangerous to him, had he been descried by his enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven they forbore to make offer one upon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captains of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of such Commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entered into Covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell between two Spanish Princes. A digression concerning Duels.

Scipio returning into Spaine, and resting that Winter, took vengeance the next year, upon those of Illurgi, Castulo, and Astapa, as hath bin said before. The Conquest of the Country being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memory of his Father and Uncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull that he should trouble himselfe with preparing slaves for that spectacle, to hazzard their lives, as was used in the City of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered themselves as Voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes, to give proofe in single combat, of the valour that was in their severall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to refer the decision of their Controversies, to tryall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbis and Orfus; Cosen-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the manner of our Irish Tamistry. But the father of Orfus stood lately seized of the principality: which, though himself received by the death of his elder brother, yet this his son would not let it goe back, but claimed to hold it as heire unto his father, and old enough to rule. Fain would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends and kindred had already laboured in vaine, to take up that quarrell; and that neither God nor Man, but only Mars, their god of battell, should be Umpire between them. So they had their wils: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skillfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the foolle-hardinesse of the younger.

Such

Such combats have been very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We read of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one betweene Paris and Memelaus; the other betweene Hector and Ajax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betweene David and Goliath; and others performed by some of Dauids Worthies, against those that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Unto the same kinde appertaines the fight betweene twelve of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Benjaminites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principall, in which they ventured their Dominion upon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren Curatii, that were Albans. The combat of 10 Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus, with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of lesse importance, as having only reference to bravery. In England there was a great Combat fought betweene Edmund Ironside, and Cnutus the Dane, for no lesse matter than the Kingdom. The use of them was very frequent in the Saxon times; almost upon every occasion, great or small. In the reigne of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Montfort against the Earle of Blois, contending for the Duchie of Brittain; there was a fight for honor of the Nations, betweene thirty of the Britons; and thirty English: two of which English, were Calverley, a brave Captain; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knolles is 30 descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them have been combats of bravery, and of Guy de Caur, as the French terme it; for honour of severall Nations; for love of Mistresses; or whatsoever else gave occasion unto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either upon accusation for life; or upon tryall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which we spake even now, betweene Corbis and Orsha. Unto these (mee thinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat upon Wager; such as were that betweene David and Goliath, or that betweene the Horatii and Curatii: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, is ad- 30 ventured upon the head of Champions. Upon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed betweene the Lord Henry of Boulainbrook, Duke of Hersford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolke. There was a combat performed by Sir John Ansley and one Cattington: whom Ansley charged with treason: and proved it upon him, by being victorious. The like was fought betweene Robert of Montfort, and Henry of Essex. The like also, betweene a Navarrais, and one Wells of Grimby, whom the Navarrais accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belyed him, and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our tryall by battell doe determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had beene due to the offender, if the accusation had beene proved; I cannot affirme. But we every where finde, That 40 if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places (offences punished by death) be overcome, He shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for tryall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramour and Low, or offered to doe, in the reigne of Queen Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten or yeeldeth, loseth onely his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats upon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of bravery; but in Campe close, that is, within railes. Now this essay by combat was ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the faire his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Jurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorials of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken up, each of the parties should pay two shillings six pence; but if it were performed, then should the party vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelve shillings. And upon this custom grew the French Proverbe; which they use when as any man hath had an hard and unjust judgement; saying, That Hee was tryed by the Law of Loray, or Berne; on le battu pay l'amende, where he that is beaten gives the recompence. Of these frequent 45 trials trials by battell that great learned man Tuo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complaine, and specially against the French Church-men: as appears by * his Letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Archbishop of Seas, and to others; wherein herebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this liberty and kinde of tryall, was retracted by S. Lewis, and Philip the faire, so that no man could decree or grant it, save the King himselfe. It hath since been granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings, as to the Lord of Carogues, against Jacques le Gris; and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro his countinman: wherein Sir Henry Knevet, Father to the Lord Knevet now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victory; and lastly to the Lord of Chastif. Now in those challenges, upon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deserving death (and in those onely) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ses defenses par un dementir. The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giving the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did taiblement confesser le crime; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, upon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie unto the Emperor Charles the fifth, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: every petty Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giving of the Lie mortality it self; holding it a matter of no small glory, to have it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France would not put up, what the great Emperor Charles the fifth had patiently endured.

From this beginning is derived a challenge of combat, grounded upon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Tryall of Right, the Wager upon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capital offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe so many Duels, as are founded upon meere private Anger, yea, or upon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein every man takes unto himselfe a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats, the giving of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so unpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that gives it. Thus the fashion, taken up in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their King, is growne to be a custome: whence we have derived a kinde of Art and Philosophie of quarrell; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yeathere are (among many no lesse ridiculous) some so mysticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one having relation to a slave, the other to a souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretty: though for my owne part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and have given him the point of honour to boot.

40 But let us examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who profess death on the points of their swords to all that give it them; use nothing so much in their conversation and course of life, as to speake and sweare falsely. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed and sworn to pay the monies & other things they borrow, doe not break their word and promise as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lyers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Justice, upon breach of word or bond? For he which hath promised 50 that he will pay money by a day, or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lyed to him to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what is the profession of love that men make now-a-days? What is the vowing of their service, and of all they have used in their ordinary complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid but good morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and Court-like kinde of lying? It is (saith a wife French man, deriding therein the Apish country of his Country) un marché & complet fait ensemble, se moquer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres: A kinde of merchandise, & complet made among them, to mocke, belie, and delude each other: and so farre now-a-days in fashion, and in use; as he that useth it not, is accounted either

dull or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complementall lies, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity upon breach of promise; and those which men use out of cowardize and feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other siled the most villanous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrels in effect: to it I say, That whosoever giveth another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more haينfully taken, than to tell him, he hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promiseth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that he will performe it; and, in not performing it, hee had made himselfe a Lier. On the other side, He that gives any man the Lie, when he himselfe knowes that he, to whom it is given, hath not lied; doth therein give the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause have I, if I say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it is mid-night; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himselfe a foolish Ruffian, and a lyer in his owne knowledge? For he that gives the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyalty, or Life; gives it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extreme rudeness to taxe any man in publique with an untruth (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the untruth is uttered:) but all that is rude, ought not to bee civilized with death. That were more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsell of God. But you will say, that these discourses favour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize to feare God or hell: whereas he that is truly wife, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword, we shall finde ten thousand seven-penny-men (waged at that price in the wars) that feare it as little, or perchance lesse, than any profest Sword-man in the world. Diligentissima in tutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitudo is a diligent preserver of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocrity between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martirem pœna: sic nec fortem pugna sed causa: As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which, whosoever shall resolutely end his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Country: as he may justly be numbered among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Divell. Neither doe we indeed take our owne revenge, or punish the injuries offered us, by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of revenge is, to give him, of whom we would be revenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death upon our owne consciences; Animasq; in vulnere ponere, And to drowne our soules in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne, in generous and noble spirits, the defence of their honours, being prest with injuries: I say that I doe not, if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the Eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; doe favour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the assailant. You will secondly aske me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honour to satisfie the challenger in private combat? I answer, that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion over it, which can judge it, which can destroy it: except you will stile those Acts honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror, and the Lawes of God appointed the Divell to second the Conquered, dying in malice: I say, that he is both base and a fool, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England, & other Christian Kings, have seldome taken any such advantage over men of quality, who upon even termes have slaine their private enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they have not often done it; so did our Noble-men and Gentlemen in former ages, in all important injuries, sue unto the King, to approve themselves by battell and publique combat. For as they dared not to brave the Law; so did they disdain to submit themselves unto the shamefull revenge thereof; the same revenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Thieves:

Nay

Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders: Yet is not the man-layder freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the party grieved notwithstanding; that is, to require justice by Grand Assize, or by battell, upon his appeale, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further saith (for I use his owne words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the man-layder) be convinced either by great Assize or by Battell, upon that appeale; the man-layder shall dye notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So favourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to justice and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men and Gentlemen shall be repared in honour, where an enemy, taking the start either in words or blowes, shall lay on them an infamy unsufferable? I say, that a Marshalls Court will easily give satisfaction in both. And if we hold it no disgrace to submit our selves for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, and Lands, and for all things else by which the lives of our selves, our wives, and children are sustained, to the Judges of the Law; because it may be felony to take by violence even that which is our owne: why should we not submit our selves unto the Judges of honour in cases of honour, because to recover our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet againe, it may be objected, That the losse of honour ought to be much more fearefull unto us, than either the losse of our goods, or of our lives; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeed, and that which ought to be so deare unto us, other than a kinde of history, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficulty or danger, and undertaken for the publique good? In these, he that is employed and trusted, if he faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he loseth his honour. But the acting of a private combat, for a private respect, and most commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of vertue, because it is contrary to the Law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult, because even and equal in persons and armes: Neither for a publique good, but tending to the contrary; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to save every mans fame and reputation, so farre as reputation may sustaine injury by words, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent us of any evil words that wee have given, and to confesse that we have done him wrong, unto whom we have given them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that gives ill words in choler, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them upon adviſement, hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeed not to be given but to those that are servile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monſieur de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was given him by a judgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gave judgement, M. de Plessis was set in a chaire under the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sat: the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himselfe, and in his left hand the like cudgel or bastinado, where-with he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he delivered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such revenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls having formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to use his owne discretion in the revenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one beforehand in point of honour, (who struck M. de Plessis like a Ruffian comming behind him, and having the advantage of company, and his horses ready, shifted himselfe away on the sudden; but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner:) or whether Monſieur de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubteth) had not farre juster cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure have beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him: let any wise man judge. To this, if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission, that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no disgrace unto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallowes, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sins to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted upon us for somewhat unworthy of a Gentleman, and of an honest man. Nay, voluntary repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall it selfe, or out of the acknowledgement of our own weaknesse. Certainly, as wise men, and valiant men do rather deride petty injuries or sudden injuries, that are not offered from malignant force-thought, than revenge them: so men apt to quarrell, do commonly suspect their own valour; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleve them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For he that knowes himselfe indeed to be an honest man, scornes to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshals of France have, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose judgement, in all disputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preserved; we may therefore as well submit our selves to the Judge of honour in all disputes of honour, as we do submit our selves in all controversies of livelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law. And out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chevalrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politike. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth hony bees; as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Revenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten up, of severall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wrath of God upon supreme Governours, than the permission.

His Majesty therefore (which Henry the fourth of France also endeavoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deed in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessors could never doe: in beating downe and extinguishing that hereditary prosecution of malice, called the deadly fend; a conquest, which shall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power for evermore. And we have cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no lesse happy in preventing the like mischief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outrageous vanity of Duellists.

Unto this that I have spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their severall degrees. There is much difference betwene Lies, as necessity upon breach of promise; or complementall lyes; and such pernicious lyes, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are uttered by false witnesses: the former fort being excusable by weaknesse or levitie; the latter being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betwene killing of a man in open field, with even weapons; & that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priviledge, commandeth that the guilefull murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is every guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betwene committing presumptuously upon a man, to slay him with guile; and lying in wait for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a cause, upon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queen Mary of England, and the Kings Majesty now reigning, have given notable testimony of their justice, upon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis upon the Lord of Talar: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporté de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient lineage, and supported by divers great alliances, of which the Cardinal of Bellay (in especiall favour with the King) was one, was notwithstanding delivered over into the hands of the Hangman. Queen Mary, upon a noble man of her owne Religion, and in many other respects very deare unto her. His Majesty, upon a Baron of Scotland, whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefull by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans, every age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilefully by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Judge) the Author of the French Recherches gives unto us two notable instances: the one of des Esbars, who (saith Pasquier) fit mourir M. de Montaigne grand Maître de France, pour contenter l'opinion de celui dont il estoit lors idolâtre; & Dieu permit que depuis

il fut pendu & estranglé; who caused Montaigne great Master of France to die to content his mind (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Esbars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soone after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, upon his Chancellor Poyet: who, to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot: a man most nobly descended, and of great service. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of love growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, he charged him with some offences which he had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming upon the great good service which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Mar-seilles against the Emperour, gave the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publique triall. Hereupon the King (it being easie to provoke an ill disposition) gave commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Judges, upon an information of the Kings advocate, to question the Admirals life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is not rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Judges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as albe it nothing could be proved against the Admirall, worthy of the Kings displeasure, yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Liberty; though not able to prevail against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the king hating falshood in so great a magistrate) other than his own degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle leçon certes (saith Pasquier) à tout Juge par demeurer toujours en soy, & ne laisser fléchir sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imaginaire faveur, qui pour fin de jeu le submerge; & faire selon à all Judges, to dwell always in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float upon the waves of imaginarie favour, which in the end overwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall, though it might have bin answered unto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as undeserved; That he was tryed, according to his owne desire, by the Lawes of his Country, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the Kings justice, surmounting all other his passions, gave back unto him his Honour, his Offices, his Liberty, and his Estate.

t. III.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spain. His return to Rome, where he is chosen Consul.

THE last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the rebellion of the people, and mutiny of his souldiers. He fell dangerously sick, in such sort, that the rumor of his death ran current throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonin and Indibilis, petty kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, & followed Scipio a while before, to take arms against the Romans. They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spain. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rashly fell upon the Suffetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and wasted their Country. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sucro, in stead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be affected with the like distemper. They had not reaped such profit of the Roman conquests, as might satisfie their desires; or as they thought easie to be gotten, if they might be their owne Carvers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time served very well, to enrich themselves with the spoyle of the Country. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonels, that should have bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellowes, Albin Calenus, and Arrim Umber, to their Commanders. These rooke upon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had been like to that, wherein Lucius Marcius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipios. But whilst they were devising what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as was expected there arrived more certain news, that Scipio was both alive, and in good health. There came also new Colonels, sent unto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their vvant of consideration, and seeming to be glad that they had no further his partie; and to helpe those whom he thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly have spared: yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the unsteady Gauls ready to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans; that under Prætors, and Prætors, lay ready to be employed where need should require; were directed unto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either coming to his aide from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is uncertaine) laden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Prætor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much disaile him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of mony, heartning him in his proceedings; yet some impediments which he found, and that farall voyage of Scipio into Africke disturbed all; and made him be re-called home.

Against Hannibal was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians have bin pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, graven in Punike and Greek letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission and carelesnesse; in those that are upon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence, infesting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to have been the occasion of this yeeres idleness; which fell out not much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was marvellously impoverished by this warre; and had already tried the utmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieve the present necessitie, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might receive no losse, the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, unto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was given to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make preffe of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he over-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the people did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is usually found in Councils of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carry all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne judgements, to the wisdom that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giving happy direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that repositeth himselfe upon the advice of many, shall often find himselfe deceived: the counsell of those many being wholly directed by the Empire of a few, that over-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature sorted well with the businesse, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Unto him therefore Q. Fulvius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well advise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italy about seven thousand Voluntaries. He had also provision from the severall Townes: Come, Iron, Canvas for sailes, Axes, Beed-hookes, Hand-mills, and the like implements; Fitte for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helms, and Spears of all kinds: every place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could afford.

Unto this willingnesse of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of five and forty dayes, he had both sell'd his Timber, built, and lanced so twenty Trieme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; where with he transported his Army into Sicil. In Sicil he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Canna: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himselfe well knew) not guilty of the overthrow, for which they had long under-gone a heavey censure. They had served under Marcellus and Lævinus, at the taking of many Cities and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good use to him in Africke, where would be store of such employment. For increasning the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young men, and such as loved well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliver their Horse and Arms, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought over with him for the purpose. Whilett he was providing to have things in a readinesse for Africke, the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recover their City. Some handcraft-men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri, (for there were two in the Towne) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed and rewarded. Scipio being advertised of this, gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadel was surpris'd. The other Citadel was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craved helpe of the Consul Scipio. The Towns-men were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians unto the Roman Senate: not onely against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Capitaine, who gave bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies, the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoyled by these barbarous Theeves. The Locrians therefore advised the Senate to make present amends to the goddesse for this sacriledge: saying, that the like had never been committed, without notorious revenge by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gave good care to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the injuries done unto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principall offenders, whom they cast into prison, and used according to their deserts: as also they restored unto Proserpina her mony twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame upon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these wicked courses. By the sharpe invective that Q. Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissolutenesse of his Army; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindefull of any service toward, nor fit for it if need should require. Finally, things were so far urged, that ten Legates were sent over into Sicil, together with the Prætor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was, they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his journey, and gave him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Lalim in Africke; rather to make discovery, than to work any other great effect of war. He took a great bootie: and strucke no little terror into the Carthaginians, who saw their affaires to be upon terms of change. But the greatest fruit of his journey was, That speaking with Masanissa, he well informed himselfe of the state of Africke; and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to joyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made under-hand with the Romans, Livie doth profess, That there was no such evident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to prove, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian far inferior to Livie, both in Worth and Time) gives so one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Onely the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe, that the knowledge of such a matter should have escaped the diligence of Livie, if it had been true: unlesse we should beleieve, that he wilfully forbore to rehearse a Tragedie; for the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howsoever it was, thus Appian tels it: and many circumstances of things done, confirme it. Asdrubal, the sonne of Geso, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masanissa loved. Masanissa, being brought up at Carthage, and being withall a goodly Gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to bee his sonne-in-law. When

When the virgin was betrothed unto him, he went into Spaine, and there did great service. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubal daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her upon Syphax, without standing to acquaint her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masanissa was advertised; and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought; yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it: which would have cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conveyed himselfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus far forth we may beleve Appianus: that the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Onely it seemes, that howsoever Sophonisba, the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians unto Syphax: yet in fine this their courtship proceeded from fear, he thought it wilde to continue and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans, untill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the war it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Livie, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Livie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed unto his reports.

Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended, by order of the Country, unto Desfalces the brother, not unto Masanissa the sonne. But this Uncle of Masanissa shortly dyed: and his elder sonne, who took possession of the kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battell by a Rebel, that made himselfe Protector over the younger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himselfe against Masanissa, whose returne he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serve: He and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masanissa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloved for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason would have beene glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Estate; had they not beene guiltie of the injury by them done unto him; whilst his Uncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed unlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice, towards his Corrivall, warred upon him; and over-charging him with numbers, drave him out of his Kingdome. Nevertheless Masanissa still retained the hearts of his people; and thereby remained strong enough, to infest both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syria, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamans, expected the coming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roades over all the Country, even as far as to Hippo; and when Lelius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the invasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good successe, than could be expected from the good will of poore Masanissa, sent an Embassage into Sicily about the same time, which was little pleasing unto Scipio. He excused himselfe of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not choose but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was borne and reigned; and for the defence of his beloved wives Country, if it were invaded. Nevertheless he promised to remain a Neuter, so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held war abroad, far enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his expedition, much more than any perswasion could have done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprize; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Adventurers. Left therefore the falling of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion, Hee thought the best way, to prevent all discourse, and set the warre undertaken immediately on foot. The Embassadors he dismissed in haste, with letters to their King: wherein hee willed him to consider, that what hee had promised, hee had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Having sent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together; and bade them make ready for the voyage, which hee intended no longer to deferre. For, said he, Masanissa hath been with Lelius: and Syphax hath newly sent me; greatly wondering upon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine rale prevented all further inquisition, that might else have beene made concerning the message of these Embassadors: whose followers had beene seene walking up and downe Syracuse. And left any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the businesse, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet unto Lilybæum: and requesting by letters Ma. Pomponius, that was Prætor in Sicily, to meet him there; halted thither with his Army. At Lilybæum he agreed with the Prætor, about the division of the Legions between them; which to leave behinde for defence of the Island; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certaine: some Historians reckoning onely ten thousand foot, and two and twenty hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirty thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them downe: since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither hee, when hee tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor others upon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word set down by an Historian, who borrowed them from Livie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Africk, neere to a fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is uncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masanissa unto Scipio at his first arrivall, helps to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinks the faire Promontorie to have been the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficulty Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syria, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment soon after his arrivall, Scipio encamped before Utica, that stood West ward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo; whence the way to Utica was not long. This is also strongly proved; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his dis-embarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roved about the Countrey with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which he usually resorted, like as before hee had met with Lelius at Hippo that was farther off; as it would have been for Scipio, with his Arnie and Carriages, to overcome the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great compasse to Utica, by Land; when he might have dis-embarked neerer unto it. Nevertheless it may passe as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the lesser Syria; since he gave charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybæum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Army: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masanissa had signified unto Lelius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoever they made brave promises, would not come strong enough to fight at hand. But when he saw their Fleet and Army to bee such, as not onely served to invade the lands of Carthage, but threatened a conquest of the City and whole Estate: then might he better advise them to set saile for Utica, and make War upon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Army than of raw Souldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in haste. Asdrubal the son of Geseo, the same that had lately been chased out of Spaine by Scipio, was their best man of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobility, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passeable. He was then with the King his son-in-law, working him no doubt against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Invasion: entreating the one of them to give assistance, and commanding the other to make his repair unto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a young Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other booty, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which hee conveyed aboard his Hulks or Ships of burden, and sent them backe loaden into Sicil. He tooke likewise a Towne called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Nu- midian horse: whose service being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceive the unskilfullnesse of their Leader, that had thus hooved them. Wherefore he sent Masaniissa before him: who rode up to the gates; and, by making a bravado, trained out the improvident Hanno so farre, that he drew him unto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or slaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the towne, which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Utica, a City of great importance, of which mention hath bene formerly made, and fate downe before it. Forty dayes he spent about it, assailing it both by Land and Sea, and using all his engines of batterry, whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of prevailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter-Campe, which must be well stored against the yeere following. Whilest thus necessity urged him to leave Utica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprize, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gave him the honour of a faire pretence to leave the siege. Asdrubal had made a Levie of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet adventured not with this ill-trained Army to draw neere unto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax: Syphax brought with him unto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which joyning unto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched bravely toward Scipio: who thereby tooke occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-Campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Navie. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontorie, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed upon lower ground, on the other shore: in the bottome of the Creek he moored his ships; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged unto the Fleet. The whole campe he strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the yeere, when it should serve him againe to fight. Of cattell and other bootie Masaniissa had brought in great store, by driving the Countrey, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Corne also he had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewise apparell for his 30 Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serve turne, for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as he could best spare; especially with captives to be sold for slaves. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped neere unto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the severe institution, which the Romans used in the discipline of warre, or for that they presumed upon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew neere, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might be wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. 40 It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally unconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had given proofe before this of his much levitie. It might therefore be hoped, That having wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peradventure no lesse weary with satiety of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre: he might be moved with a little entreatie to withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Neuer. But it is not unlikely, that such a friend as this King, had bene highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was neere at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had bene invited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe a while: his wife Queen Sophonibala being also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoever it were, 50 Syphax did onely make an overture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should by recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africke, and so make an end of the warre: whereupon now both Africke and Europe were disquieted. Unto this would not Scipio at the first give care: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadors, he began to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was given to understand by those whom he had sent unto the King, That the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cab-bins, and covered with boughs: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, used coverings of Mattes and Reeds; others, that came later, had tharched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaves: under which they lay carelessly without their Trenches. Upon this advertisement he bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to set their camps on fire, and thereby give them a notable overthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, hee fore-saw that it would be a worke of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his warres when time should serve. It was a plaine open Countrey wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, upon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legi- 10 ons. The longer therefore that he thought upon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt upon their Campe. To this end hee sent many Embassadors, under pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpose to discover all that might concerne the intended surprize. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers, disguised like slaves; that wandering (as it were) idle up and downe the Campe, might observe the wayes and entrances, with whatsoever else was needfull. When he had learned as much as he desired: upon the sudden hee sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, forasmuch as he could not get the content of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his designe in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very penfive; as having lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they began to devise, by what art they might draw Scipio out of his Campe, and provoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe, they hoped to make his Councell of war repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did Marcus Atilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him? which they themselves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. 20 By such discourses these two comforted themselves; recompencing (in conceipt) the losse of their hopes past, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was growne upon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to doe somewhat against Utica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon he lay against Utica before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to have notice of it: partly to hinder those of Utica from setting upon the few, that he purposed to leave behinde him in his Campe. He caused his men that night to sup well, and betimes; that they might bee ready for the journey. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, to the defence of his Campe; all the rest of the army he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seven miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to undertake himselfe with the one halfe of his army; the other halfe he committed to Lelium and Masaniissa, whom he sent before him to set upon the campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to have taken hold by casualty upon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the campe of Asdrubal; it would be suspected as the doing of enemies; and give Syphax warning to looke to himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and 30 softly; that Lelium & Masaniissa, who had a longer journey, and were to fetch a compass about for feare of being discovered, might have time to get before him, and do their feat. It was about two or three of the clocke in the morning, when the campe of Syphax began to blaze: which not onely the Numidians, but their King himselfe, imputed unto a casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betwene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe-asleepe; and others; that had sitten up late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly understand in what case they were, nor give any remedie to the mischance, as it 40 was was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischief, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell upon the enemies sword, which was ready to receive them: Especially Masanissa, that best knew the Countrey, did great execution upon them; having laid all the waies, by which hee foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: so that some ranne out to help the poore Numidians; carrying onely what would serve to quench the fire. Others ranne up to the Rampart: where, fearelesse of any danger towards themselves, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would have it. He therefore lost no time: but setting upon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest back in to their campe, which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but shifted onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had been taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have bene said, that with lesse than one halfe of thirty thousand men, hee might at least have given some bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling these fires, had he not bene only carefull how to save his owne fearefull head. Nevertheless Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to have bene true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would have striven to shew valour, when the Campe was once on fire: He should not thereby have done any manner of good, because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not need to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirmes) none that hath beene is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their severall wayes of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselves in the darke: but they were not many, as after shall appeare. Surely it must needs have bene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away, and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Livie, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seem to have followed some lesse worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting up the summe. For hee reckons onely two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to have escaped; forty thousand to have perished by sword or fire; and above sixe thousand to have bin taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of fourescore and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes.

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next town that was very strongly fortified, thought there to finde the Romans worke, untill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repaire their Army. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which hee thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Towne-men would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Unto this disputation, he well foresaw, that the arrivall of Scipio would soone give an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold upon him, and seeke the Victors favour by delivering him up; he shrunke away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the town, which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first comming; and thereby preserved it selfe from all manner of loffe. The two next Townes adjoining would needs be valiant; and make countenance of war: but their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This being done, he returned to the siege of Utica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason, when, in stead of either Peace or Victory, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable overthrow. Necessary enforced them to make hastie provision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them saw any meanes. Some gave advice to crave peace of Scipio: others, to send for Hannibal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion. That notwithstanding the losse of this Army, they might well defend defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way, lewying in all haste another Army; and sending Embassadors to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their unfortunate Commander, Asdrubal the sonne of Gesto, was employed to make new levies of men: and Queene Sophoniba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax; who having gathered together as many as hee could of his subjects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne Kingdome. Sophoniba laboured so with her husband, that at length the wonne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought over to serve in Africke. Of these were made such brave reports, as if their courage, and the armes which they used, were not to bee resisted. Even the multitude within Carthage beleeveth these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole countrey of Spain had beene twice conquered; first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much; which the Carthaginian Embassadors helped with a lye; saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty daies they made up an Army, consisting well-neere of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called, The Great Fields, about fivedayes journey from Utica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Utica thither, to visit them: leaving behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Army, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three daies, after the meeting of both armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now bene time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman Fabius, and seeke to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or else, it was not in his power to give such directions as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, having their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masanissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the battaile. The victory was gotten without many blowes: for the untrained followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Masanissa. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even untill they were all in a manner slaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were thus come over to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them, than upon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacie was beneficiall to those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal, and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne Kingdome: whether his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, having thus gotten the mastery of the field, tooke counsaile about the prosecution of the warre. It was resolved upon as the best course, That he himselfe, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masanissa, with his Numidians, and Laelius, with some of the Roman Legions, should followe after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdome, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice, it seemes that Masanissa gave: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might bee done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne Kingdom, usurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Laelius was sent away with Masanissa; and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the warre from towne to towne. Many places yielded for feare; many were taken by force; and all the subjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those unreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid upon them for maintenance of the warre in Spain and Italy. What to doe in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolve: Fortune was their Enemy; they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who nevertheless of their own free-will were likely to give little help. Very much it grieved them to send for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embassadors should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gave advice, to set out a fleet against that of Scipio, that rode before Utica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was buried in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all means the City of Carthage: upon the safety whereof they laid all depended: adding, that whilst they were true, and at unity among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsels were not rejected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt upon the Roman fleet at Utica. Nevertheless, it was considered, that hereby they should onely protract the warre, without any advancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the shippes at Utica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come over into Africke, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken up, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the fortification of the Towne: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to imbarque themselves for Italy.

In this their trepidation Scipio came to Tunes, a City in those dayes very strong, and standing in prospect almost of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible place adjoining, he easily tooke; the garrison forsaking it, and running away as soone as he drew neere. But whilst he was about there to incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the City, he might perceive the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Utica: What this meant, he readily conceived; and stood in great feare, lest his own ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heavily laden with engines of battery, & wholly disposed in such order, as was most convenient for assaulting the town) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that special service. Wherefore he halted away towards Utica, to assist with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should have come too late. Neither could he indeed have beene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had used such diligence as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Utica, they tarried awhile to make a bravado; presenting themselves in order of battell, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: hee thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their braverie at Sea; it should little avails the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behinde another, made a foure-fold bridge over the Channel of the Haven; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, wherewith his Frigots, and other small Vessels, might run out and backe againe upon any advantage or need: but these he covered with planks, using the masts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to joyne all together, that his men might helpe one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce this worke finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Haven. The fight betweene them and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood upon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and unsteady, could not do. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, adventuring forth from behind the bridge, were greatly over-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood upon the Bridge were neither able to relieve them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends, that were intangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chaines. These they threw upon the masts and yards which served as arches to joyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all asunder; in such sort, that one ship followed another, & all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to save themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them untouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but having haled away fixe ships of burden, and rowed them out of the Haven, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater than their victory: because among so many grievous losses, only this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilst things thus passed about Carthage, Lelium and Masanissa, in their journey against Syphax, found as good successe as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masanissa to his Kingdome, without farther contention: the Masseili, his subjects, joyfully receiving him, & forsaking the usurpers. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. Hee had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore being solicited by Aidruba and Sophomaba, hee prepared againe for warre. But beside the instigation of his beloved wife; the losse of the Masseili would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lelium and Masanissa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse unwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession, bee the title unto some part never so unjust. Hercunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that she had vomited up her owne gues; when it was onely the garbage of some other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed; and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleaved the Kingdome of the Masseili to be part of his entrailes: Lelium and Masanissa will shortly give him somewhat that shall make him cast his gues. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had beene converted into strong enmity; as also to set in his place another, who might do them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best, as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, even to this day though there be many strong Towns, yet the fortune of a battaile is enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order, according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion; long agoe sent unto him out of Spaine from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered up in haste: and few of them had sene warre before. Encamping neere unto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small troupes of horse on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: so that at length Syphax, unwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foile at their first meeting with the Enemy, came up with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith over-charged Masanissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilst he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman squadrons of Foot came against him through their own Troupes of horse; which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their battaile standing now more firme, than a little before, Syphax was unable, though he laboured much in vaine, to make them give ground. Masanissa likewise, and his Troupes grew confident upon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to give backe. Herewithall the Legions came in sight: which terrified to the Numidian horse, that they beganne presently to disband. Faine would Syphax have stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leave him. But it fell out unhappily, that hee was cast from his horse, which received a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slain or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsooke the place, and fled, and that their King, upon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Masanissa told Lelium, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian war, if presently they halted away to Cirta the chiefe City of the Kingdome; whither he himselfe desired to

to be sent before with the Horfe, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lelius agreed. Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any news of the Kings misfortune was there arrived, called out the chief of the City to parlee: wherein by many false promises and threats, but especially by shewing unto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so farre, that the gates were forthwith opened unto him; and every one strove to get his favour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisba yielded her selfe into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that she might not be delivered up unto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suite, that Masanissa forthwith granted it; & to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to prevent Lelius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was his wife. But Lelius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainously, so that at first he would have haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and have sent her unto Scipio. But being over-intreated by Masanissa, he suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other captives immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masanissa, when they had done what was needfull in the Kingdome.

At the coming of Syphax, there was great joy in the Roman Campe: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Adrubalus, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship; with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministering to every one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him, not onely to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre upon them, unprovoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moved him so to doe; calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, that Masanissa was no wiser than himselfe, since hee had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masanissa and Lelius came unto him: both of whom together he lovingly welcomed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable service in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him understand, that the Romans had title to her head, and that she was a mischievous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he intreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memory of his great services already done (for which hee should bee highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence upon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be governed by Scipio, whom he neverthelesse intreated, to thinke upon his faith given to Sophonisba, that she should not bee delivered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called unto him a servant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes used then to have in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them unwilling to live:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it unto her with this message; That gladly he would have had her to live with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans: willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her selfe.

At the receipt of this Message and Present, shee onely said; That if her husband had no better token to send unto his new wife, he must accept of this; adding, That she might have dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funeral. And herewithall she boldly dranke off the poison. Thus Livie reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it downe agreeably to that which hath beene spoken before, concerning the præcontract betwene Masanissa and Sophonisba. He saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Lelius and Masanissa upon their way thither, yeelding up their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne private, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax: as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Masanissa at his returne, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masanissa said, she, was his owne wife, and unto him betrothed many yeeres before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masanissa should keepe her in possession, as long as it was disputable, unto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime unto her, wherein he should have no wrong. Herewithall he sent to fetch her away: and Masanissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliver her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gave unto her a cup of poison, wherewith she ended her life, before they came that should have apprehended her. So he shewed unto the Romans her dead body, which he royally interred. The sudden violence of Masanissa's love, and the ready consent of Sophonisba to marry with him: added not so much credit unto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evident cause (which Livie notes) of the sudden falling out betwene him and the Carthaginians, under whom he had bin trained up, and done them great service. Howsoever it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragick accident, sent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholy should lead him to some inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gave unto him a Crowne of gold, with other Royall ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to divert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, unto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that began to smile upon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took upon them to create or proclaim a King. Which honour though Masanissa well deserved: yet would not the Title have redounded unto his great benefit; neither should he have beene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recovered possession of his Country, together with the greatest part of Syphax's Dominions. It seemeth not unlikely, that had he remained a Numidian in these warres, and sustained himselfe with his troupe of horse, in such sort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might neverthelesse have recovered his proper inheritance, by the love of his owne subjects without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice beene vanquished. As for the enlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunity, than of such a man, upon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Massejli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noised abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themselves, in a politicke sort of gravity, tooke highly upon them; as if even their saluting him by the name of King, had beene a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, inroaching upon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all upon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the son of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speake more) which held some piece of his fathers Kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all meanes to deserve their love, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that never any before him had made this a matter of suite: yet the Roman Senate was punitious herein, and answered very gravely, That it was not their custom to give the honour of that appellation, save onely unto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; and in proceesse of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefit unto Kings, that no way depended upon them, the salutation by * that name, though it were not accompanied with any offer favour or profit thence redounding.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians desire Truce, and breake it.

THE Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befallne their good friend Syphax, and understood that Masanissa their mortall enemy, had got possession of his Kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begun at his last being there. The Carthaginians

nians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth unto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the city, which were their Privie Councell, to make suite for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the * feet of him, and of those that sat in Councell with him.

* Excerpt. 2 Polyb.

Liv. lib. 30.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to have unjustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict upon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy unto the City of Carthage; and let it remaine, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be overthrowne. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame upon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begonne the Warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appears, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired worke in hand, of suing unto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men over those that were subject unto their power, for they would not have made such adoration to the Romans in their owne necessity unless they themselves had expected the like, where they had the advantage.

It was not unknowne to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poore case the city of Rome then was; and how unable to defray the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately beene. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the walls of Carthage, though Utica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though hee came into Africke, to make a conquest, and not a Peace: yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Justice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed upon them, were these; That they should render up unto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitive slaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaulle: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any land betweene Italy and Africke: That they should deliver up all their shippes of warre, save twenty; and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gave them three dayes: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors unto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masanissa was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the war had beene already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lalius unto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with joy, and gave hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open; and an holy day appointed for thanksgiving and supplication to their gods. Lalius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanissa: who gratulating the happy successe of the Romans in their African warre, and giving thanks unto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio unto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subjects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed upon him, who by rendering them to liberty, should doe an avery plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Masanissa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should doe for him, they called him King againe; released his Numidians that were captives; and sent him two purple Caffocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other presents, as in time of their poverty might serve to restitute their good will. Scarcely were these and Lalius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors

were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: untill Lalius being sent for, came backe from Ofizia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the Suburbs. The errand of these Embassadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their Citie, was only to winne time, and get respite for warre; untill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chafe the Romans out of Africke, or to obtaine peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, upon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded betweene them and Lutaius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remaine in force: neither had there since beene any warre at all, betweene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was only Hannibal, that, without any leave from Carthage, had of his owne head besieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum: and after that adventured in like sort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a jeast of a warre, that had beene so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that peace made by Lutaius, and other passages following betweene the two Cities. But they excused themselves, by their age: (for they were all young men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gaine time, untill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Lalius, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, we finde in Polybius, That the Senate receiving advertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed betweene him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gave him licence thereupon, to proceed unto conclusion. This may with good reason be beleevd, since it was not unknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest upon the most uncertaine issue of one battell betweene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africke were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in suspense, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came backe from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred shippes of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africke, to victual the Roman Campe, was overtaken by foule-weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wreck, was dispersed, and driven aground in divers parts of the Bay of Carthage, even in view, and under command of the Citie. There was at that time, as we finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which caused the people to cry out upon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them, saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger urged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage understood (as it seems) that all this discourse of peace in hand, was no better than mere mockery, and therefore cared not for observation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality together with women and boyes, to be meddling in uproares; the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no marvelle, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out under Asdrubal, to gather up the dispersed Roman shippes of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recovered the station whereto their camp adjoynd) and bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby relieved; but for that by this breach of Truce, he fore-saw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the warre, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors unto them, both to require satisfaction for the injury done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gave the Carthaginians to understand, that Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace; upon those conditions which he had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, That ye, who so lately have cast your selves to the ground before us, kissed our feet, men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for himself: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost: as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the loss of two thousand and three hundred of the Pretors Army, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides divers Colonels, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hot piece of service. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. However it were, this victory would have much imported for the assurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant sones of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himselfe (by easie journies, because of his wound) ¹⁰ into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gave him to understand the pleasure of their City, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to think upon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage it selfe was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and imbarqued shortly his Army; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage, to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were ready to burst out, whilst the Embassadors were delivering their errand. When their message was done; He told them, That this was yet ²⁰ plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid me come home, have long agoe done their best to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply that should have enabled me to mannage the Warre here. Scipio therefore should not need to bragge, that hee had drawne me home by the heeles: it is Hanno that hath wrought this noble feat, and overwhelmed the house of the Barchines, for lacke of other means to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that which after came to passe: wherein he imbarqued, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that shrunk back from him, and refused to doe service in this expedition: of whom, such as he could take, he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Juno Lacinia, which ³⁰ had been held an inviolable Sanctuary unto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italy no lesse passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their owne Countries to go into exile. He looked back unto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that he had not led his Army from Canna, hot and bloudied as it was, directly unto the walls of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italy; wherein hee had lived almost halfe his time.

If it could have been foretold unto the Romans, in the first beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal's departure out of Italy: they would (I think) lesse earnestly have pressed the Carthaginians to send him over thither. When sure advertisement was brought unto the Citty, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holy-day was appointed for thanksgiving unto their gods; and extraordinary great sacrifices publicly made, for joy of such happy tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his coming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Country, than ever he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remove of the War from their owne doores, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped, was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought unto them a great masse of Gold and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred back unto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Upon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies that had bin borrowed in time of more necessity from private men. Hence also proceeded the severe chastisement laid upon those 12. Colonies, that for want either of meanes or of good will, had refused to give aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced to give double the number of Foot to that which they had had been wont to set out for the Wars, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the very most of their ability. So confident were the Romans grown (though their wealth were not as yet futable to the greatnesse of their spirit) upon the good successe of the battell at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nearely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Army, whereof Italy had been few daies since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to revolve a thousand fearful matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would be found a true Prophet. For, bethinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax and Afarubal no specialty of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had been wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe scullions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a fit Captaine for such Souldiers. Likewise Afarubal the son of Gesco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise, one, that in the field was only good at saving himselfe by a swift retreat. But now there came an Army of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman bloud, and wearing the spoyles, not only of good souldiers, but of brave Captaines, by them slaine. Such talke used the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet ¹⁰ in battell with many that had slaine Roman Pretors, yea, and Consuls with their owne hands; with many that had been first in getting over the Trenches of severall Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of Towns; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Army, as good as ever had served in War, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

*Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vaine, le-10 *seib a battell at Nadasara, and persuadest the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

H Annibal disembarked his Army at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italy. Therefore it behooved him to land, as he did, somewhat farr from the Enemy; that he might furnish himselfe of these and the like needfull helps against the day of battell. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In-land Country, gathering friends unto him by the way. Tychem a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to have in those dayes the best Hordes of service, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure unto his partie: making him understand, that if the Romans got the victory, it should be easie for Masaniissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppress both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindered his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that used it, prevailed with Tychem; who shortly after brought unto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further adds, That Megetullus, (the same who had made himselfe Protector over Masaniissa his Cousins, and was Head of a Family, and adverse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise, that Vermine the Son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the same time to assaile the places that yielded obedience to Masaniissa. This ¹⁰ Vermine, as we finde in Livie, came with more than 16. thousand men (for he lost more than so many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would have made the victory assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene so base as to make humble suit unto the Romans for peace; whilst they had such a brave Champion alive, to maintaine their cause by Warre. But when as they bethought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they out earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad: and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was Generall of their forces, He thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Nevertheless; to give them satisfaction, He made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce made by the Carthaginians: The violence done to his Embassadors: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africk, made Scipio to understand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld unto any conditions unprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore he sent unto Masaniissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other businessse apart. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masaniissa had with him; that were lent unto him by Scipio, to doe him service in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well understood, that those and many more be sides all his owne forces, would but little avails him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking such order as he could upon the sudden, for the safety of his owne kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and sixe thousand Foot, he made all haste unto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned back under the conduct of Latus and Fulvius: who brought them safe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaved themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion:

M. Babius one of the late Embassadors that had bin in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands upon them and detained them; sending word unto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make Warre in the Country, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their owne Coyne, for the injury by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to heare of this; and commanded Babius to use them with all possible courtesie, and send them safe home. By thus doing, He brake the hearts of his enemies; and caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great victory) far lesse honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, he made more cruell War upon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to sacke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Town by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the mindes of those, with whom they had to doe, they used oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beasts, that ran athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies asunder, as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practice at other times: it is likely that now they omitted no piece of cruelty; when they meant to give proofe of their vehement indignation, and revengefull minds, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scowts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay, what they were doing, and as much as might be, of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, & brought unto Scipio: who in stead of crushing them up, gave them free leave to view his Campe at pleasure, appointing one to conduct them up and downe, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This done, Hee gave them leave to depart; and sent them away safe unto their Generall. Hannibal understanding this, admired the bravery and courage of his enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to have an Enter-view, and personall conference; and signified so much unto him by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that Hee would meete him shortly in a place convenient. The next day Masaniissa came with his Army: to whom Scipio taking with him, removed unto a Towne called Nadagara; neare unto which he satte downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely serve his Campe. Thence he sent word unto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly serve, if he had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Zama, and came within foure miles of the enemy: where he incamped well to his owne good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driven to take much paines, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generalls each of them with a troupe of Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came unto a piece of ground; which was before well searched for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way between their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliver his minde to this effect: That it had been better both for Carthage, and Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africk and of Italy, for that the Countries of Sicily and of Spain, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had been lost, and of so much blood as had been shedde, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, unto what extreme dangers their owne Cities had been exposed, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was even time for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition, Hee affirmed that his owne yeares, and long tryall of Fortune, both good and evil, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience, might rather fixe his minde upon uncertain hopes, than upon the contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affaires are subject. Tet (said he) mine owne example may peradventure suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal, who after my victorie at Cannae, won the greatest part of Italy: and devised with my selfe, what I should doe with your City of Rome, which I hoped verily to have taken. Once I brought mine armie to your walls, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage; but now, see the change! I stand here entreating thee to grant us peace. This may serve as aduocement of Fortunes instability. I have fought with thy father Scipio: He was the first of the Roman Generalls that ever met me in the field. I did then little think, that the time would come, that I should have such businessse, as now at the present, with his son. But this is even one of Fortunes pageants, wherof she hath many. And thou maist have experience of the like in thy selfe, who knows how soone. Thinke upon M. Atilius: If he would have hearkened unto such persuasions, as I now use to thee, he might have returned home to Rome an happy man, and so maist thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou bee contented, that all Spain, Sicily, Sardinia, and whatsoever Ilands else are situate between Italy and Africk be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever, and left unto the Romans, to bear dominion therein? Thou shalt have glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargain. As for us, our owne quiet shall henceforth give us contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make us faithfully observe the peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou must undergoe for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou maist have without contention. It is now in thine owne power to lay hold upon good fortune, if it please thee: stay but untill to morrow night, and thou maist take such fortune as it please the gods. The issue of battaile is uncertain, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steele we shall each of us bring into the field; but of the victory neither of us hath assurance. Let us therefore without more ado make peace. And doe not tell mee that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like treaty: It is I Hannibal that now desire peace with thee, which I would never doe, if I thought it not expedient for my country. And thinking it expedient, I will alwaies maintaine it, like as I have maintained, unto my power, as long as the gods did not envie me the war by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicily and in Spain which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the final issue of the Warres had approved, and would approve to bee most just. As for the mutability of Fortune, he said, that hee was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence or over-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plain that all these Countries with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already won from the Romans? If, said he, these conditions had bin proponed whilst as yet we detained some part of Italy, they might peradventure not have bin rejected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason why I should remit unto you any one piece of these my former demands, to which the Carthaginians have yielded already, and thought me to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the injuries which they have done me since, have made them unworthy of obtaining peace upon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens understand, from how much of their burden they are by thy means eased. Onely thou must thinke that in like sort it concerns me in honour not to let them be gainers or savers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore unto us ransom-free, all prisoners that they have of ours, so pay us five thousand talents, to deliver up their galleys, and to deliver hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this by their breach of truce, their spoiling of our fleet, and their violating our Embassadors? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done, then will I take advice with my counsell what answer to give you; otherwise you may even prepare for warre, and blame your own selves for that I have denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battell, wherein should be decided the quarrell betwene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they issued into the field: a notable march, and such as hath very seldom been found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended, or the great importance of the battell at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, divided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance between them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise divided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite unto the voyd spaces between the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was usuall, might fall back between the Principes; but he placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, wherof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore he took such order, that when they had passed through the spaces betwene the first Battalions, they should not come upon the Principes in Front. Unto his Velites, or those of the light armature that were to begin the fight, he gave direction, that when they found themselves to be over-charged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should run back through those lanes that were betwene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, untill they were got behind all their owne Army; thereby leaving room enough unto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to save themselves on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battels, without cloying up the way betwene the Maniples, which he desired to keep open. His Italian horse he placed in the left wing, under C. Lelius. In the right wing was Masanissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding up and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; using words, not many, but forcible. He bade them remember what they had achieved, since their coming into Africk. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the Warre was at an end: and that their victory in this War, should make them Lords of all the World, for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would flie. They were farre from home, yea, and far from their owne standing Campe: neither was there any place in Africk, that would give them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: unless they would live like wretched slaves under most mercilesse enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, have never been knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourescore, in Front

Front of his Battell. Next behind these, he made his Vanguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Baleares, and Moors. Then followed his Battell; which was of Carthaginians & Africans, more interessed in the quarrell than were those Mercenaries; though not so good fouldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behind these came his Rereward, consisting of those brave Souldiers which had served him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lelius, in his owne right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tychæus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masanissa. He was indeed farre too weake for the Enemy in horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tychæus and Mezerullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the foure thousand of Masanissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be levied in the hastes of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that had of late been often vanquished, and accustomed to flye. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serve on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could have done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Verrina the son of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixtene thousand and upwards, the most of them Horse, the advantage of number might have served well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay, Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their severall conditions: promising unto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards; threatening the Carthaginians with inevitable servitude if they lost that day: but especially animating his old fellow-fouldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke upon the Enemies, and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Army which they had slaughtered at Cannæ. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, even the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions, which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; even such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundry battels, could no longer be trusted to beare Armes in their owne Countrey. As for the rest, they were young men, the sons of Cowards, and bred up in the continuall feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slain or chased. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, upon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day strive to make good their honour; and to purchase the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations used the two Generals before the fight. When they drew neere together, the Numidian horsemen on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battell: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake upon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were always an uncertaine kind of help) those that stood neere unto the point of the left wing, turned back for feare: and ran upon their own Numidian Horse; which they affrighted and disordered. Masanissa espying this, gave charge upon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to rally themselves, drave them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the spaces betwene the Maniples: but without any harm to the Battalions themselves; which gave them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed; but ran backe upon the right point of their owne battell, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gave to Lelius the same advantage that Masanissa had against the Numidians; which he used in like sort. In the meane while, the battels of foot advanced, and drew neere together with a slow and wately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gave a shout, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quicknesse, to have the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme; than they took. But the Roman discipline after a while prevailed against the boisterous violence of these untrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Hastati, encouraged their fellowes; and shewed themselves ready, if need were, to relieve them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries received no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should have seconded them. For the new-leiued Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired souldiers give back, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to thinke themselves betrayed; whereupon they inclined unto flight. The Carthaginian Battell was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to give way unto the Mercenaries for their safe retreat; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chafed by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of worke, that the Principes were faine to come up unto them, and helpe to over-bear this great medley of enemies, that were together by the cares among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which, hindring one another, could neither fight, nor easily flye. Such of them as escaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foot, to helpe or save these Run-aways. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would have rushed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battell, and save themselves in the open field. The ground, over which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heapes of dead bodies and weapons; and so slipperie with blood, that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Armie, which hee saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might bee well assured to receive a notable overthrow. He caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the maine battell of the Hannibalsians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarii, he placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Corners. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than ever he had beene received in his life before. All the dayes worke till now, seemed to have been a matter of pastime, in regard of the sharpe Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their having prevailed all the day before: they were also farre the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; (and perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gave backe one foot; but rather chose to die on the ground whereon he stood. So that, after a long time, it was uncertaine which part had the worke: unless it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of Masaniass and Laelius from pursuit of the Enemies Horfe, is said to have beene most happy and in a sudden time. These upon a sudden charged the Hannibalsians in Rere; and over-bearing them by meeere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battell there died of the Romans fiftene hundred and upwards: on the Carthaginian side, above twenty thousand; besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captain of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Livie reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horfe: and being enjoyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage, to take battell with such disadvantage, he could worke no marvels. He saved himselfe with a few Horfe; and stayed not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage; from which he had beene absent sixe and thirtie yeeres. At his comming into the Senate, He said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolved to send Embassadours againe, and trie the favour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio having spoyle the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Utica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fifty Gallies and an hundred Ships of burden. With this Fleet, and that which he had before, He thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed unto Cn. Obolus, whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Laelius away to Rome with newes of the victory, set saile from Utica towards Carthage. He was encountered on the way by ten Embassadours from the Citie: who bearing up with the Admirall Gallie, began to use the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where he would give them audience. So rowing along before the Citie, and viewing it more in bravery, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned backe to Utica, and called backe Obolus thither, with whom in person He set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journey thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, was coming with an Army of more Horfe than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina seemed to have bin both carelesse of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Army. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horfe, was sent against him: which did not onely bear him, but so compass him in, that he hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leaving fiftene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelve hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had bin with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should have been far better conducted, and might well have changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost by default of Horfe. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great access unto the former; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadours from Carthage: whose behaviour, though it was more pittifull than it had bin before, yet procured it lesse commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had inlike sort humbled themselves. Nevertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious work it would prove, to besiege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly, Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this warre, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands, and given to one of the Consuls. Cn. Servilius Capius, that Consul who had charge of the war against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italy was bold to passe over into the Ile of Sicily (as it were in chafe of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the command of the Army there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restrain the ambition of this Consul Servilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suite for the same Province of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet he needs would be going, procuring onely leave of the Senate, that he being Consul might joyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authority. But ere he could have his Fleet and all things in a readinesse for the journey, where in no man cared to further him, Winter came on, and he was onely tost at Sea with so foule weather; first upon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate in desiring Africk for his Province, that he said he would suffer nothing to passe in the Senate, untill he had first his will. Much adoce there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the people, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should have command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answer unto the Carthaginian Embassadours. He willed them to consider what they had deserved: and in regard thereof, to thinke themselves well dealt withall; in that he was contented to leave unto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Governour over them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection; leaving also unto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. As touching the rest he was at a point, That, before he either granted them peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilst the late Treaty was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld, then required He, That immediately they should deliver up to the Romans all prisoners, fugitives, and renegadoes, that they had of theirs; likewise all their Gallies, excepting ten; and all their Elephants. That they should make no warre at all thence forth out of Africke, neither yet within Africke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countreies, Townes, goods whatsoever, belonging any wise unto Mafaniſſa, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their poſſeſſion, ſhould be all by them reſtored unto him: That they ſhould finde corne for the Roman Army, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded: That they ſhould pay tenne thouſand Talents of Silver, in the ſpace of ſixtie yeeres, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for obſervance of Conditions, they ſhould give an hundred hostages: ſuch as Scipio would chooſe, being none of them under foureteene yeeres of age, nor above thirtie.

With theſe conditions the Embaſſadours returned home, and reported them unto the Citie. They were very unpleaſing; and therefore one Geſcio ſtood up to ſpeake againſt them: and exhorted the people, who gave good attention, that they ſhould not condeſcend unto ſuch intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withall what favourable audience was given to this vaine Oratour, by the unquiet, yet unwilke Multitude, was bold to pull him downe from his ſtanding, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by ſuch inſolence of this preſumptuous Captain. Which Hannibal perceiving, roſe up and ſpoke unto them, ſaying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had bene thence abſent than the cuſtomes of the Citie would allow; forasmuch as he had bene thence abſent ever ſince he was a Boy of nine yeeres old, untill he was now a man of five and forty. Having thus excuſed himſelfe of the diſorder, he diſcourſed unto them concerning the Peace: and perſwaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themſelves, had the Demands of the Enemie bene yet more rigorous. Finally, upon good advice, they reſolved to yeeld unto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand five and twenty thouſand pounds weight in ſilver, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embaſſadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three months, in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gave injunction, that they ſhould neither in the meane while ſend Embaſſadours any whither elſe, nor yet diſmiſſe any Embaſſadours to them ſent, without firſt making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wiſe and honourable men, by the miſeries wherinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious counſels. Afdrubal, ſurnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embaſſages which they ſent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embaſſadours, who related unto the Senate and People theſe joyfull newes. About the ſame time arrived at Rome Embaſſadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to waite a while for audience, till the election of new Conſuls then in hand was finiſhed; and order taken, for the provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embaſſadours called into the Senate: who firſt answering unto ſome points, wherein the Romans had lately ſignified unto their King, that they found themſelves grieved; returned the blame upon thoſe Greeks themſelves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accuſed they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embaſſadours, that had lately been ſent from Rome unto King Philip, tarried in Greece behind his fellowes, and there levying men, made warre upon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betwixt him and the Romans. Further they deſired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countrey-men, that had lately ſerved Hannibal for Pay; and being taken priſoners in Africke, were kept in bonds by Scipio might be releaſed and delivered unto them. Unto all this M. Furio, whom Aurelius had ſent to Rome for that purpoſe, made a ſharp anſwer. He ſaid, that the Greeks which were confederate with Rome, endured ſo many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to ſtay behinde, to help them as he might; which elſe were like to be brought under the Kings ſubjection. As for Sopater, he affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counſell, and very inward with him: one that ſerved not for money, but carried money with him, and ſaue thouſand men, ſent from the King to the aid of Hannibal. About theſe points, when the Macedonian Embaſſadours could make unto the Senate no good anſwer, they were willed to returne, and tell their Maſter; That warre he fought, and and war he ſhould find, if he proceeded as he had begun. For in two maine points He had broken the League, that was between him and the Romans: firſt, in that he had wronged their Confederates; and ſecondly, in that he had ayded their Enemies againſt them with men and money.

Theſe quarrels with Philip, that promiſed to open a way into Greece and the Eaſterne Countreies, helped well the Carthaginian Embaſſadours in their ſolicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reverend company, when they entered into the Senate: and Afdrubal above the reſt was much reſpected; as one, whoſe good offices had kept the Romans from neceſſity of ſending Embaſſadours to Carthage, upon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the juſtice of the quarrell had bene wholly on the Romans ſide; ſaying, that it was the fault of ſome violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuſe the Citie that had bene too vehement in the proſecution of bad counſell. But if Hanno and himſelfe might have had their wils, the Carthaginians, even at the beſt of their Fortune, ſhould have granted the peace which they now deſired. Herewithall he commended the moderation of the Romans, as no ſmall argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had bene victorious. To the ſame effect ſpoke the reſt of the Embaſſadours: all of them entreating to have the Peace ratified; though ſome with more lamentable words than others, according to the diverſity of their ſtile. They had patience enough to endure ſuch reproofe of Perjury, as they themſelves might have laid upon the Romans; if their diligence and fortune had been ſuch as the Romans was. Among the reſt, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would ſweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Afdrubal made anſwer; Even by the ſame gods, that are ſo ſevere unto thoſe that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Conſul, interpoſing the authoritie of his office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding unto concluſion of peace; for that hereby he was like to loſe the honour, which he purpoſed to get by making warre in Africke. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom reſted the Sovereign Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly unto the pleaſure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio, with tenne Delegates, ſent unto him from Rome of purpoſe, ſhould make a League with the Carthaginians, upon ſuch Conditions as ſeemed beſt: which were none other, than the ſame which he had already propounded. For this favour the Carthaginian Embaſſadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might viſite their Countrey-men, which were priſoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ranſome and carry home with them ſome that were their eſpecial friends; of whom they gave in writing almoſt two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of thoſe Priſoners, which the Embaſſadours would chooſe, ſhould be ſent over into Africke, and be freely reſtored to liberty by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyne with Scipio in commiſſion.

At their coming into Africke, the Peace was given, and accepted, without any controverſie or diſputation. The Priſoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, were delivered up to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's, than upon the Fugitives; and upon thoſe of the Romans, than upon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the firſt payment of their money, the Carthaginians were ſomewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treafurie could have ſpared two hundred Talents for the preſent; yet ſince the penſion was annuall, and to continue ſixtie yeeres; it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collection of the ſumme there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; ſo as many, even of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwiſe, Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which when he was checked by Afdrubal Hadum, and told, That it worſt of all beſeemed him to laugh, ſince he had bin the cauſe why all others did weep; He answered, That laughter did not alwaies proceed from joy; but ſometimes from extremity of indignation: Yet, ſaid He, My laughter is more reaſonable, and leſſe abuſed, than your teares. For ye ſhould have wept when ye gave up your Ships and Elephants, and when ye bound your own hands from the uſe of armes, without the good leave of the Romans firſt obtained. This miſerable condition keeps us under, and holds us in aſſured ſervitude. But of theſe matters yee had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purſes, purſes, ye have thereof ſome ſenſe. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye ſhall acknowledge, that it was the very leaſt part of your miſery for which ye have ſhed theſe teares. Thus diſcourſed Hannibal unto thoſe, who, taſting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counſell, repented when it was too late; and in ſtead of curſing their own diſorders, which had bred this grievous diſeaſe, accuſed the Phyſician, whole noble endeavours had bin employed in procuring the remedie.

Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Maſaniſſa, and magnified him in preſence of the Armie, with high commendations not undeſervedly. To him alſo he conſigned over thoſe towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that preſent held: where- in, to ſay truth, he gave him but his due; and that which otherwiſe he knew not well how to beſtow. But the love of the Romans, & friendſhip of Scipio, was fully answerable, now to hereafter, to all the deſervings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there reſted no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarked themſelves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lilybæum, Scipio with ſome part of his Army took his way home to Rome by land; and ſent the reſt before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no leſſe glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to doe him honour as he paſſed along. He entered the Citie in Triumph: nei- ther was there ever before, or after, any triumph celebrated with ſo great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pompe, there were others in time ſhortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this Triumph, and died ſooner after in priſon; or whether he were dead a while be- fore, it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed, That it was a barbarous cu- ſtome of the Romans, to inſult over the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea, though they were ſuch, as had alwayes made faire and courteous warre. But hereof we ſhall have better exanple ere the ſame age paſſe. It was neither the perſon of Syphax, nor any other glory of the ſpectacle, that ſo much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous warre paſt, whereof the Romans had bin in a manner without hope that ever they ſhould ſee Italy free. This made them looke cheerefully upon the Author of ſo great a conversion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio the Title of the African: ſtiling him by the name of that Province which he had ſubdued. This honourable kinde of ſurname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was ſurſuped by men of leſſe deſert: eſpecially by many of the Ca- ſars, who ſometimes arrogated unto themſelves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if ſuch glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

CHAP. IV.

Of Philip the father of Perſeus, King of Macedon: his firſt Acts and War with the Romans, by whom he was ſubdued.

§. I.

How the Romans grew acquainted in the Eaſt-Countries, and deſirous of Warre there. The beginning of many Princes, with great Wars, at one time. The Aetolians over-run Peloponneſus. Philip and his Associates make war againſt the Aetolians. Alteration of the State in Sparta. The Aetolians invade Greece and Macedon, and are invaded at home by Philip.

F the great ſimilitude found in worldly events, the limitation of matter hath bin aſſigned as a probable cauſe. For ſince Nature is confined unto a ſubject that is not unbounded; the workes of Nature muſt needs be finite, & many of them reſemble one the other. Now in thoſe actions, that ſeem to have their whole dependance upon the will of man, wee are leſſe to wonder, if we finde leſſe variety: ſince it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious obnoxious unto humane power; and ſince they are the ſame affections, by which the wills of ſundry men are over-ruled, in managing the affaires of our daily life. It may be obſerved in the change of Empires, before thoſe times whereof we now write, how the Aſſyrians or Chaldeans invaded the Kingdome of the Medes, with two hundred thouſand Foot, and threeſcore thouſand Horſe: but failing in their intended conqueſt, they became ſubject within a while themſelves unto the Medes and Perſians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greeks with ſuch number of men, as might have ſeemed reſiſtleſſe. But after that the Perſians were beaten home againe, their Empire was never ſecure of the Greeks: who at all times of leiſure from intestine Warre, deviſed upon that conqueſt thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonnoſor with his rough old Souldiers, had undertaken the Medes; or Cyrus with his well-trayned Armie, had made attempt upon Greece; the iſſue might, in humane reaſon, have beene farre different. Yet would it then have beene expedient for them to employ the travell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatneſſe of their names, againſt thoſe people; that were no leſſe valiant, though leſſe renowned, than their owne. For the menacing words uſed by Cyrus, and ſome ſmall diſpleaſures done to the Greeks (in which kinde it may be, that Nabuchodonnoſor likewiſe offended the Medes and Perſians) were not ſo available to victory, as to draw on revenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in ſtrength, ſuffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppreſſion done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kicke by the Aſſe. But Princes are often carried away from reaſon, by miſſe-underſtanding the language of Fame: and deſpiſing the vertue that makes little noiſe, adventure to provoke it againſt themſelves; as if it were not poſſible that their owne glorie ſhould be ſoiled by any of leſſe-noted excellence. Againſt the ſame ſtone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Evilmerodach, had ſtumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirot hath daſt his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though moſt of make, and a better Souldier than any other Greekiſh King, when he entered into warre againſt the Romans. This warre he undertooke as it were for his minds ſake: having received no injurie; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greeks that ſerved under him, to prevail ſo eaſily againſt the barbarous Romans, that they ſhould onely ſerve as a ſtep to his further intended conqueſts, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory againſt Pyrrhus, had found their owne vertue to be of richer metall, than was the more ſhinning valour of the Greeks: then did all the bravery of the Epyrot (his Elephants and whatſoever elſe had ſerved to make him terrible) ſerve onely to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themſelves. * For ſince they had overcome the beſt Warriour in Greece, even Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himſelfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what ſhould hinder them from the conqueſt of all thoſe unwarlike Provinces, which in compaſſe of 12. yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had wonne? Certainly there was hereunto requiſite no more, than to bring to their owne devotion by ſome good meanes, the whole Country of Greece: all the reſt, this done, would follow of it ſelfe. How to deale with the Greeks, Philip and Alexander had ſhewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the firſt Punicke warre was ended, which followed ſooner after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leiſure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occaſion, that ſhould be on that ſide preſented. They had alſo then a ſtrong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwiſe very ſkilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wiſhed, that the Illyrian Queene Teuta made at the ſame time cruell war upon the Greeks: waſting their Country, and ſacking their Townes, onely becauſe they were unable to reſiſt, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were deſirous to enter; the Queene was not ſlow to give them cauſe. And their happy accompliſhing of that warre which they made with Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not unworthy to make their Patronage to be deſired by the Greeks. But no ſuch thing happened: though they ſent Embaſſadours, as it were to offer themſelves; by ſignifying, that for love of Greece they had undertaken this Illyrian warre. Thus beganne the firſt acquaintance betwixt the Greeks and Romans: which afterwards encreaſed very haſtily, through the indifcretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whoſe buſineſſe with

*The King of Spaine pretended invincible Navie, being beaten out of the Britiſh Seas; invited us to thoſe of Spaine: and having broken the great Fleet that ever the Spaniards gathered together, we never made account of any of his preparations after that time.

Lib. 5. cap. 2. §. 7.

with them, being now the subject of our storie, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions. It was like to prove a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4. yeeres, new Kings began to reign in the most of all Countries knowne; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3. of the greatest Kingdomes. This happed from the third yeere of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the Great. Ptolomy Philopater succeeded in the Kingdome of Egypt unto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. yeeres old, received the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Acheans & most of the Greekes; by the decease of his Uncle Antigonos Dofon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamonia, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reigne in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found means to make himselfe King over the Lacedamonians, whose Commonwealth, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achaus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebell unto him, occupied the Regions neere unto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeeres of the 100. and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome & Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invasion upon Italy. Those troubles of the Western world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed unto an end: so Antiochus, Ptolomy, & the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Acheans, and many others his dependants. That Country, having freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonos from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subjection unto Cleomenes: was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have beene to the Spartan; & therewithall it lay open unto the violence of the Aetolians, who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Aetolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted unto any other Art than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Messenians that were their owne Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinity) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their invasion was no lesse unexpected, than it was unjust: whereby with greater ease they made spoile of the Country, & finding none prepared to make resistance. The Acheans, were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly; because the Aetolians passing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Old Aratus could hardly abide these Aetolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the injuries; wherewith most ingratfully they had required no small benefits done to them by the Acheans. He was therefore so hastie to fall upon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to stay few daies untill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Acheans for the yeere following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath beene already noted of him) for any other service, than leading of an Army. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a part of the Country, wherein he might very easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neere, when they had recovered ground of advantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie. So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Acheans, they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made Confederacy. Shortly after, the Aetolians invaded Peloponnesus againe; having no more to doe, than to passe over the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Country of the Eleans. There joyned with them, in this their second invasion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of war unto the coast of Greece: made bold to seek adventures againe, & did great mischief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell upon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Aegean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilaidas, or Scerdileus, having gotten gotten what they could else-where by roving at Sea, accompanied the Aetolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater havocke in the Country now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that urged to have some grievous punishment layd upon the Lacedamonians; who were thought under-hand to have favoured the Aetolians, in mere despite of the Acheans and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately beene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedamonians had been so affected: & (which was worse) at the arrivall of Philip, they flew such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgement: but intreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Army: since their Towne was largely much disquieted with civill discord, which they hoped soone to appease, and meant always to remaine at his devotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly governed him) did mis-understand the Lacedamonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Acheans, Bæotians, Epirots, and Acaranians: all complaining upon the Aetolians: and desiring to have war decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters unto the Aetolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have beene there at the day. But when the Aetolians understood this for certain, they adjourned the Councell unto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, save in the great Parliament of all Aetolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how wel they had deserved it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Invasions made on Peloponnesus, and the onely man, in a sort, upon whom they must have laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publike.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where he prepared busily for the warre against the yeere following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words and promises; whom he easily won from the Aetolian side, forasmuch as the Aetolians had couzened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Acheans, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Country, sent unto the Acaranians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedamonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce war unto the Aetolians; without staying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they received divers answers according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acaranians, a free-hearted and valiant though a small Nation, and bordering upon the Aetolians, of whom they stood in continual danger; said, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithfull meaning in that warre, which was concluded by general assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were nevertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood upon a needlesse point, and desired to be held excused, untill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Messenians, for whose cause the warre was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne which the Aetolians held upon their borders, and said, that they durst not be over-bold, untill that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedamonians, the chiefs of them studied onely, how to manage the treason, for which their City had beene so largely pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three yeeres together continued subject against their wills to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should returne out of Egypt to reigne over them againe, and maintaine, as hee was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publike safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preserved them. And hereto they referred all their counsailes: being perhaps a little moved with respect of the benefit, which might redound unto themselves, by adhering firmly to those which at the present bore rule over them. Others, and those the greater part, were still devising, how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his return; & fought to joyne with the Ætolians, which were the most likely to give him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority, and durst more freely speake their mindes: but the contrary side was the more passionate, and spared not by murders or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neither did it suffice, that about these times there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended: fancying unto themselves the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come againe. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them unto their greatness and lustre; to which once hee had in a manner performed: But since hee was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deserving vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helps, they must continue little better than subjects unto the Macedonian, and farre lesse by him respected, than were the Acheans. Thus were they transported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Ætolians to send an Embassie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly unto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durst have made himselfe the Author. Much disputation, and hot, there was, betwene those of the Macedonian partie, and these their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; untill by massacre or banishment of all, or the chiefe, that spake against the Ætolians, the diversity of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betwene the Lacedemonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Acheans, who had spared the Citie, when they might have destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the choosing of the one King, that we may justly wonder, how they grew so carelesse in making choyce of the other. In the one of their Royall Families they found Agisipolis, the sonne of Agisipolis, the son of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reigne over them, as heire apparent to his grandfather. This Agisipolis was a yong Boy, standing in neede of a Guardian: & had an Uncle, his Fathers brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how yong soever, should have his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedemonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in observation of the Law, that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Uncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall Family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime, but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the Kingdome, bestowed upon each of the Ephori, a Talent, and thereby made himselfe be saluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to gratifie his Partisans, and to approve his worth by action, invaded the Countrey of the Argives: which lay open and unguarded, as in a time of peace. There he did great spoile, and won divers Townes; whereof two he retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedemon. After such open hostility, the Lacedemonians declared themselves on the Ætolian side; and proclaimed warre against the Acheans.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, than the Acheans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gave uncertaine answer: the Messenians would not stirre: all the burden must lie upon themselves and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by favour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and by helpe of the Lacedemonians, could assaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing over the Bay of Corinth, surpris'd the Towne of Ægira: which if they could have held, they should thereby grievously have molested the Acheans: for that it stood in the mid-way between Ægium and Sicyon, two of their principall Cities, and gave open way into the heart of all their Countrey. But as Ægira was taken by surpris: so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoile; whilst they that should have made it their first care, to assure the place unto themselves, by occupying the citadell and other peeces of strength, fell heedlesly to ransacke private houses, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great slaughter backe unto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Army landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Western Coast of Achaia; waiting all the Territory of the Dymeans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achaean Confederacie. The Dymeans and their neighbours made head against these Invaders; but were so well beaten, that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They sent for helpe unto their Prator, and to all the Townes of their Society in vaine. For the Acheans having lately beene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his warre, they had covetously withheld part of their due from those that served them therein. So through this disability of the Acheans, and insufficiency of their Prator, the Dymeans, with others, were driven to withhold their contribution heretofore made for the publike service, & to convert the money to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedemonians, began to win upon the Arcadians, that were confederate with Philip & the Acheans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Army was thus employed a farre off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots joynd all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier peece, which they desired to get into their own hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There he spent forty dayes, ere he could end the busines; which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Ætolia at his first coming in; it was thought that he might have had an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon small Towns or Forts: and not seldome, that the importunity of Associates, to have their own desires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those uses for which they never were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their maine designs. Thus was our King Henric the eight led aside, & quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperor to the siege of Townray: at such time as the French King Lewis the twelfth, hearing that the strong City of Terwin was lost, and that his Cavallerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earle of Essex with seven hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, in case that Henric would have come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambracia, did wondrously embolden the Ætolians: in such sort, as their Prator Scopas adventured to leade all their forces out of the Countrey; and therewith not onely to over-runne Thessalie, but to make impression into Macedon. He ranne as farre as to Dium, a City of Macedon upon the Ægean Sea: which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, he tooke, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but overturned all: and among the rest, he threw down the Statua that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrey-men at his returne; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be growne terrible, not onely (as before) unto Peloponnesus, but even to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrey, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip having dispatched his worke at Ambracia, made a strong invasion upon Ætolia. He tooke Phœtia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Peanium, Eleus, and divers other Towns and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundry skirmishes; and wasted all the Countrey over, without receiving any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Straights into Peloponnesus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrey of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently solicited by the Achaean Embassadors; newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardaniens were ready with a great Armie to fall upon the Countrey. These Dardaniens were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hæmus from the Northerne part of Macedon, & were accustomed to seeke booty in that wealthy Kingdome, when they found their own times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journey into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrey; as had beene their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to dismisse the Achaean Embassadors, (whom he should have accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them have patience untill another yeere. So he tooke his way homewards: and as hee was passing out of Acarnania into Epirum, there repaired unto him Demetrius Pharius, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Doson in the warres of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome unto the Macedonian King: whose Counsellor he was ever after. The Dardaniens hearing of the Kings returne, brake up their Army; and gave over for the present their invasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilst his people gathered in their Harvest. But the Epirots rested not. They avenged themselves upon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Etolia, they required with all extremities of warre; among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, & all thought of war, untill another year, was laid aside: Philip stole a journey into Peloponnesus, with five thousand Foot, & about foure hundred Horse. As soon as he was within Corinth; He commanded the gates to be shut, that no word should be carried forth of his arrivall. He sent privily for old Arctus to come thither unto him: with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achaean Souldiers ready to meete him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrey, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot & an hundred horse; little thinking to meete with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to feare: since the Achaean themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; untill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Etolians, and their fellows, were by him surpris'd, and all made prisoners; or slaine. By this exploit which he did at his first coming, Philip got very much reputation, and likewise he purchased both reputation and love, by divers actions immediately following. He won Pisphie, an exceeding strong Towne, in the borders of Arcadia, which the Eleans and Etolians then held. He won it by assault at his first coming: wherein it much availed him, that the Enemy, not believing that he would undertake such a peece of worke at such an unreasonable time of the year, was carelesse of providing even such store of weapons, as might have served to defend it. The Towne was preferr'd by the King from sacke; and given to the Achaean, of his own meeke motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yielded for very feare, hearing how easily he had taken Pisphie. This Towne also he gave to the Achaean. The like liberality he used towards others, that had ancient title unto places by him recovered. Then fell he upon the Countrey of Elis, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and lived abroad in Villages; even such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the Citie of Olympia: where having done sacrifice to Jupiter, sealed his Captaines, and refreshed his Army three dayes; He proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Etolians, in the spoiles of their otherwise-deserving neighbours. Great abundance of Cattell he tooke, with great numbers of slaves, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could be found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes, whereinto a great multitude of the Countrey-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yielded for feare. Some prevented the labour of his journey; by sending Embassadors to yeeld before he came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wills, tooke courage to set themselves at liberty, by seeing the King so neere: to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Etolian Captains; because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King won more Towns in the Countrey, than the sharpnesse of winter would suffer him to stay three dayes. Faine he would have fought with the Etolians: but they made such haste from him, that he could not overtake them, till they had covered themselves within the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to have beene safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licencie to depart, with their lives and armes. Having performed so much in this expedition, the King reposed himselfe awhile in Megalopolis; and then removed to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arrivall in Peloponnesus, the Macedonians, with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; & threaten'd to do great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamity that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging over their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home.

This

This Lycurgus, as he had no other right to the Kingdome of Spuria, than that which he could buy with money: so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealousies, with which Usurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall blood, that thinking himselfe to have best right unto the Kingdome, purposed to make way therunto by massacre of his opposites; & afterwards to confirme himselfe, by propounding unto the multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equal distribution of all the lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Commonwealth. He won to his partie some two hundred men; with whom he fell upon the Ephori, as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his house: who perceiving the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto predisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilst he was using his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him: Chilon perceived whereabouts they went, and shifted presently away. So he lived afterwards among the Achaean a banished man, & hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus, he returned home: & suspecting thenceforth all those of Heracles his race, found means to drive out his fellow-King young Agepolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected, in such sort, as once he should have beene apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might have beene defended; yet rather than to adventure himselfe into judgement, hee chose to flee for a time, and sojourn among his friends the Etolians. His well-knownne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured unto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they began to consider the weakenesse of their owne firmnes against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, He took better heede unto himselfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they listed. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that he chased Agepolis out of the City; I do not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three usurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the rank of Tyrants; which the last of the three very justly deserved. Whatsoever he was toward some private Citizens: in the warre against Philip, He behaved himselfe as a provident man, and careful of his Countreys good.

§. II.

How Philip was misadvised by ill Counsaillers: who afterwards wrought treason against him; and were justly punished. He invadeth the Etolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted unto them.

Whilst the King lay at Argos devising upon his businesse for the year following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their own greatnesse, as they were like to have spoiled all that he took in hand. Antigonus Doson had left unto Philip such Counsaillers, as to him did seeme the fittest men for governing of his youth. The chiefe of these was Apelles, that had the charge of his person, & also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that he should doe a notable peece of service to his Prince, if hee could reduce the Achaean unto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to passe; during the late Expedition he had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achaean out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the booty that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, hee was bold to chastise some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to help their fellowes; then he laid by the heeles, and punished as Murders. Hereby he thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that they should be qualified with an habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing unjust that pleased the King. But these Achaean were tenderly sensible in matters of liberty: whereof if they could have beene contented to suffer any little little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the war against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves unto old Araus; and besought him to thinke upon some good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Araus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words upon those that had bene wronged, and forbade Apelles to follow the course begonne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed; though he dissembled his choler for a time. He thought so well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps unable to doe the King any valuable service, in businesse of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be than that among the Achaens there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Araus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court; promising to become their especial friend, and command them unto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Araus, he must be faine to deale precisely with the Achaens, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased to give countenance unto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Achaens, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conforme themselves unto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such persuasions, he drew the King to be present at Agium, where the Achaens were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would have bin needfull in a businesse of more importance, the King by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new favourites, was chosen Prætor, in stead of one more worthy, for whom Araus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction unto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Paras and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrison yielded it up for feare, at his first coming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it upon the Dymaens, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his prisoner; because he found him an intelligent man, and one that undertooke to make them forsake their alliance with the Etolians, and joyne with him upon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to doe, he willed Amphidamus to let them understand, That he would render unto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forreine invasion; & that they should hold their liberty entire, living after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept under by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new invasion upon their Countrey: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before over-hastie to beleieve such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on worke for no other end, than to breede a mutuall diffidence betweene them and the Etolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and send him prisoner into Etolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe; in better for Araus. For the King (as was said) marveling what should be the cause, that hee heard no newes from the Eleans, concerning the offers which hee had made unto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsaillor thereby tooke occasion to supplant Araus. He said that old Araus, and his sonne together, had such devices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out. For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Araus, (the father and the son) had taken him aside and given him to understand, that it would be very prejudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the devotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very careful in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lye, devised by Apelles himselfe, upon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Araus, and bade Apelles rehearse it over againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, taking talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had said all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such ungratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achaens; & therein having made it known what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your selves. Old Araus gravely admonished the King; That whensoever he heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne, or a man of worth, He should beare a while to give credit, untill hee had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should never thereof repent him. At the present he said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himselfe the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and said that he would make sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilst Apelles delayed to bring in the proofe, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Araus: which when he found no better than a meere device against his honourable friends; He entertained them in loving manner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The unresist temper of Apelles, having with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe; beganne (as commonly Ambition useth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, he had prepared a snare for the Araus: so fayling of them; he thinks it wisdome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow which drave away Flies out of the chimnie; but was carried (net and all) into the Aire by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtilt workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next unto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lievtenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithfull men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leoniun Captaine of the Targentiers, and Megalæus chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily won to be at Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remove the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their rooms. Against Alexander he went to worke the ordinary way, by calumnniation and privie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he used more finenesse; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of war, and one, whom for his many vertues the King might ill spare from being alwayes in his presence. By such Art he thought to have removed him, as we say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sunne. In the meane season Araus retired himselfe; and sought to avoide the dangerous friendship of the King by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch; and one that had no grace with the people. Wherefore a great deale of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the money and the Corne; wherewith he should have bene furnished by the Achaens. This made the King understand his owne error; which he wisely sought to reforme betimes. He perswaded the Achaens to rejourne their Parliament from Agium, to Sycion, the Towne of Araus. There he dealt with the old man and his son, perswading them to forget what was past; and laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the travell of these worthy men, He easily obtained what he would of the Achaens. Fifty talents they gave him out of hand; with great store of Corne: & further decreed, That so long as he himselfe in person followed the wars in Peloponnesus, he should receive ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to provide shipping, that so he might invade the Etolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure; and binder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things go forward so well without his helpe; even by the ministry of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into a conspiracie with Leoniun and Megalæus: binding himselfe and them by Oath, to crosse and bring bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of ability to doe any thing without them; should make him speake them faire, and be glad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilst he was a child; and therefore these wise men perswaded themselves, that, by looking bigge upon him, and imputing unto him all that fell out ill through their own misgovernment of his affaires, they might rule him as a child still. Apelles would needs goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behinde with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their dutie.

His Fleet and Army being in a readinesse: Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Aeolians sent men, little fearing that the mischiefe would have fallen, as soone after it did, upon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to helpe them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Achaens, with some part of his & their Mercenaries. He himselfe with the body of his Army putting to Sea, landed in the Ile of Cephalenia: whence the Aeolians, dwelling over against it, used to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to rove abroad. There he besieged the Towne of Palaea, that had bene very serviceable to the Enemye against him and his Confederates; and might bee very usefull to him, if hee could get it. Whilst he lay before this Towne, there came unto him fiftene shippes of warre from Sceridilaides; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts save one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he overthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leontius Captaine of the Targentiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembering his covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to doe his best; and caused others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many slaine, not of the worst Souldiers; but such as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindred the victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought upon breaking up the siege. For it was easier unto the Townes-men to make up the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilst he stood thus perplexed and uncertaine what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard upon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Countrey. The Messenians alleged, that Lycargus was busie in wasting their Countrey: upon whom the King might come unawares in one day; the Eeolian windes which then blew, serving fity for his Navigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dogge-dayes) and make him spend the Summer to small or no purpose. But Aratus gave better counsaile, and prevailed. He shewed how unfitting it were, to let the Aeolians over-runne all Thessalie againe, and some part of Macedon, whilst the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small adventures. Rather, he said that the time now served well to carry the warre into Aetolia; since the Prætor was gone thence abroad roving, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lycargus, he was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Achaens were appointed to make head against him. According to this advice, the King sets sayle for Aetolia, and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Aeolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and joynd with him as many of them as could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance upon their bad neighbours. He marched up into the in-land Countrey: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retreat; he passed on to Thermum, which was the Receptracle of the Aeolians, and sinit place of defence in all extremities. The Countrey round about was a great Fastnesse, environed with rockie Mountaines of very narrow, steepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Aeolians use to hold all their cheefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their solemne Games. There also they used to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest security. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them careless in looking unto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoile: whereof whereof he found such plenty, that he thought the paines of his journey well recompenced. So he loaded his Armie: and consuming all that could not be carryed away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the cheife of all belonging unto the Aeolians; in remembrance of their like courtesie, shewed upon the Temples of Drum and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour have bene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Monsieur du Goungues the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Aeolians laid for him: which that they would doe, he beleaved before; and therefore was not taken unawares. Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush, fell upon his skirts: but he laid a Counter-ambush for them, of his Ilyrians; who staying behind the rest, did set upon the backs of the Aeolians, whilst they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with slaughter of the enemy, he returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Countrey round about him. He safely carried all that he had gotten aboard his fleet. Once the Aeolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Siratus in great bravery. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The joy of this victorious Expedition being every way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast unto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were invited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleus. They came, because they could not choose: but their heave looks argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperity. It grieved them to think, that they should be able to give no better account unto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; since Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had played his own part with a most mischievous dexteritie. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reviling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great uprore; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King tending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him send for Leontius and his fellowes. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleus, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder: and they, to give him froward answers: insomuch, as they said at length, That they would never give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as he deserved. Herupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targentiers at his heeles: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megaleus, yea and to cast him into prison? Why, said the King, it was even I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angrie; seeing himselfe out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megaleus was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hindrance of the Kings victory at Palaea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no lesse touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megaleus that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak; that he, and Crimon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crimon being remanded back to prison; and Leontius becoming Baile for Megaleus. This was done upon the way home-wards, as the King was returning to Corinib.

Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as hee was at Corinib, he tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacedamonians. These and the Eleans had done what harme they could in Peloponnesus, whilst the King was absent. The Achaens had opposed them as well as they could; with ill successe, yet so, as they hindred them from doing such harme as else they would have done. But when Philip came, he over-ran the Countrey about Lacedamon: & was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleieve that he was returned out of Aetolia. He tooke not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the fields: and having beaten the enemy in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinib a rich booty of cattell, slaves, and other Countrey-spoile. At Corinib he found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace unto the Aetolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deale first with the Aetolians, who if they would make the same request, should not finde him unreasonable. The Ætoliens had sped ill that yeer: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeeres following. The Army that they had sent forth to waste Thessaly and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had beene grievously afflicted, as before was shewed, by Philip in the centre of their owne Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was up in armes against them, and their weakie Allies the Eleans and Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keepe the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætoliens readily entertained this negotiation of Peace: and taking truce for thirty dayes with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his presence at a Diet of their nation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should find them conformable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand, Leontius and Megalæas thought to have terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device forted to no good effect. The souldiers were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right unto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noise, and breaking open of doores, without further harme done. This was enough to informe the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the Souldiers themselves, repenting of their insolence, desired to have the Authors of the tumult fought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megalæas were afraid, lest the matter would soone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent unto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason; requesting him speedily to repaire unto Corinth, where hee might stand betweene them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while beene wanting to the businesse, undertaken by him and his treacherous companions. Hee had taken upon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was hee growne in to such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessalie addressed themselves unto him, and received from him their dispatch in every businesse. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making slight mention (onely for fashions sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogance of this great man, in setting himselfe out unto the people: but in managing the Kings affaires, hee made it his speciall care, that money, and all things needfull for the publike service, should bee wanting. Yea hee enforced the King, for very neede, to sell his owne Plate and household vessels: thinking to resolve these and all other difficulties, by onely saying, Sir, he ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would give assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his journey from Chalcis in the Isle of Eubœa, to the City of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pompe and royalty, by a great number of the Captaines and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megalæas drew forth to meete him on the way. So entring the city with a goodly traine, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspicion of his falsehood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort, that going thence to his lodgings, he had none to follow him save; his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of privacie, he used him not at all. This taught Megalæas to looke to himselfe, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion his Lievtenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targetiers, as it were to do some piece of service, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targetiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent unto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megalæas, if that were all the matter, they said they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiers made Philip more hattie than else he would have beene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megalæas were intercepted, which hee wrote unto the Ætoliens; villifying the King with opprobrious words, and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even ready to sinke under the burden of his owne poverty. By this the King understood more perfectly the falsehood, not only of Megalæas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megalæas that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their lives. Megalæas also, neither daring to stand to tryall, nor knowing whither to fly, was weary of his own life; and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Ætoliens, as they had begun this warre upon hope of accomplishing what they lifted in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this young Prince, tempered with the cold advice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Nevertheless being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold upon all advantages, when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megalæas, together with some indignation thereupon conceived by some of the Kings Targetiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing sorry. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this unquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the War should rest upon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for War against the yeare following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian Souldiers, by yeelding to let them winter in their owne Countrey. In his returne homeward, he called into judgement one Protonie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the fame Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment; yet now they think the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vain is the confidence, on which Rebels use to build, in their favour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Townes; from which the Dardanians, Ætoliens, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his Kingdome: when he had thus provided for safety of his owne; the Ætoliens might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, with others from Protonie King of Egypt, and from the Citie of Byzantium, recontinuing the former solicitation about the Peace. This fashion had been taken up in matters of Greece, ever since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to set the whole Countrey at liberty: No sooner was any Province or Citie in danger to bee oppressed and subdued by force of warre, but presently there were found intercessors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his advantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad fought to binde unto them those people, that were howsoever weakie in numbers, yet very good souldiers. But hereby it came to passe, that the more forward fort, especially the Ætoliens, whose whole Nation was addicted to falsehood and robbery; durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their Neighbours: being well assured that if they had the worst, The love of Greece would be sufficient for to reedee me their quiet. They had, since the late Treaty of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Acheans, and standing in feare to be more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly than before, to make an end of the Warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answer unto the Embassadors, as he had done the former yeare; That he gave no occasion to the beginning of this Warre, nor was at the present affraid to continue it, or unwilling to end it: But that the Ætoliens, if they had a desire to live in rest, must first be dealt withall, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such answer as he should think fit.

Philip

Philip had at this time no great liking unto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the War. But it happened in the middest of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victory Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battell at Thrafymene. These letters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian War. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before unto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happy it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing War betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians.¹⁰ For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seek by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrey should bear peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of War, should lay hold on the opportunity, now fidly serving to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy.

Such advice could the Ætolians then give, when they stood in feare of danger threatening them at hand: but being soone after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from observing and following their owngood counsell, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Countrey (but themselves before any other part of the Countrey) under servitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That every one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages paid.

§. III.

Philip at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

THIS being agreed upon: the Greekes betooke themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the businesse of Italy, about which he consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battell of Canna: after which he joynd in league with Hannibal, as hath been shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice unto the Romans; and knew no other way to be avenged upon them, or to recover his owne lost kingdom, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsell, to make part with their enemies. It had otherwise been farre more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, he should perhaps have brought them to peace upon some equal termes; and thereby, as did Hiero, a farre weaker Prince,⁴⁰ have both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The issue of the counsell which he followed, will appeare soone after in this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, upon such Conditions that might easily be broken: have been related in another place, as belonging unto the second Punic War. Wherefore I will only here set down the tenour of the League between Him and Carthage: which may seeme not unworthy to be read, if only in regard of the forme it selfe then used; though it had been over-long to have been inserted into a more busie peece.

The Oath and Covenants betweene Hannibal General of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embassador of Philip King of Macedon.

THIS is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the General, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barnocai, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Army, have made with Xenophanes the son of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the son of Demetrius hath sent unto us for himselfe and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Jupiter, and Juno, and Apollo: before * The God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolaus: before Mars,^{*} Triton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sunne, the Moone, and the Earth; before Rivers and Meddowes, and Waters; before all the Gods that have power over Carthage; before all the Gods that rule over Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods that are Presidents of Warre, and present at the making of this League. Hannibal the General hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Army: Be it agreed betweene You and Us; that this Oath stand for friendship and loving affection, that We become friends, familiar, and brethren, Upon Covenant, that the safety of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the General, and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians, using the same Lawes, and of the Iticians, and as many Cities and Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Associates, and of all Townes and Nations with which we hold friendship in Italy, Gaul, and Liguria, and with whom we shall hold friendship or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preserved by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greekes as are their Associates. In like manner shall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greekes his Associates, be saved and preserved by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Iticians, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaul, and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter joyne with Us in Italy. Wee shall not take Counsell one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. With all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtilty, We shall be enemies unto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Townes, and Havens, with which Wee have already league and friendship. We also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, or Nations, with which we have already league and friendship.⁵⁰ The War that We have with the Romans, have Ye also with them, untill the Gods shall give us a new and happy end. Ye shall aid Us with those things whereof we have need, and shall do according to the Covenants betweene Us. But if the Gods shall not give unto You and Us their helpe in this War against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, We shall make friendship in such wise that Ye shall be partakers of the same friendship, With Condition, That they shall not have power to make War upon you: Neither shall the Romans be Lords over the Corcyrians, nor over those of Apollonia, nor Dyrachium, nor over Pharus, nor Dimalte, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render unto Demetrius Pharius all those that belong unto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make War upon You or Us; We will succour one another in that War, as either shall have need. The same shall be observed in War made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom we hold already league and friendship. To this league if We or Ye shall think fit to add or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

§. IIII.

How Philip yielded to his naturall wices, being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Associates: With the troubles into which hee thereby fell, whilest he bore a part in the second Punick War. He poysoneth Aratus: and grows hateful to the Achæans.

Hitherto Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdom, hee might have offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punick War, proceeded from a royall greatness of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrey. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath been said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly governed him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudy, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listeing to doe what he ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should help to serve his turne in all that he took in hand. Before he should busie himselfe in Italy, he thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates, under a more absolute forme of subjection. Hereunto Apelles had advised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boytious Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if hee might not wholly have his owne way, but were driven to await the Kings humours: at other times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to observe the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reines in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could never doe.

There arose about these times a very hot Faction among the Messenians, betweene the Nobility and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a forreigne War) unto domestick objects, than allayed and reduced unto a more quiet temper. In proceffe of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was intreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth strive any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his coming thither, he found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this renowned old man: but talked in private with such of the Messenians as repaired unto him. He asked the Governours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the insolence of the unruly Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilest each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere that hee were gone that should countenance their doings. The Governours therefore would have apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers up of the multitude unto sedition. Upon this occasion, the people tooke Armes: and running upon the Nobility and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage, almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemed, that it would be easie to worry the Sheepe, when the Dogs their guardians were slaine. But his falshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear to tell him of it in publike, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But having already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should need the help and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as he could. Hee ledde old Aratus aside by the hand; and went up into the Castle of Ithome, that was over Messene. There he pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne use; for that it was of notable strength, and would serve to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Countrey. Whilest he was therefore sacrificing, and had the entralls of the beast delivered into his hands, as was the manner; he shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly goe out of it, or rather keep it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have soothed him a little; were it only for desire to make amends for the angry words newly spoken by his son. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gave this verdict: If thou be a soothsayer, thou must goe thy waies, and let slip this good advantage; if thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunity, but hold the Oxe by both his horns. Thus he spake; resembling Ithome and Acrocorinth unto the two horns of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith unto the Messenians: But if, by seizing upon Ithome, He must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left unto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it far better to depart with his fouldiers, and keep men in duty, as he had done hitherto, by their own good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his enemies.

To this good advice Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike thenceforth growing betwene him and the Arats; whom he thought more froward than befemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For, as he plainly discovered his tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceived, that in resorting to his house, He had been dishonest with his sons wife. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his owne Countrey-man, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him company. In this journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That unhoneest counsels are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But he would needs have them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious unto his Will, He seized upon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; having no good colour of these doings: but thinking himself strong enough to doe what he listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in stead of settling the Countrey, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: He kindled a fire in it which he could never quench, until it had laid hold on his own Palace. Whilest he was thus labouring to bind the hands that should have fought for him in Italy: M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts; who not only maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Aetolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that Warre; the occurrences whereof we have related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In manning whereof, though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leisure served, He made it apparent that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the liberty of the Messenians; but made another journey into their Countrey, with hope to deceive them as before. They understood him better now than before; and therefore were not hasty to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serve, He went to worke by force; and calling them his enemies, invaded them with open Warre. But in that Warre he could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprize. In this attempt upon Messene, he lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsellor and Flatterer, not his Perverter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that he sped, the more angry he waxed against those that seemed not to favour his injurious doings. Wherefore by the ministry of Taurion, his Lievtenant, he poysoned old Aratus; and shortly after that he poysoned also the younger Aratus: hoping that these things would never have been knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poysons themselves were more sure than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed unto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Proceffions, to be celebrated every yeare twice, with a Priest ordained unto him for that purpose; as was accustomed unto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are said to have been encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to have been true, since the helpe of the Devill is never failing to the increase of Idolatry.

The loving memory of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achaens a marvellous dislike of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counsel for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or believed: neither were they in case to subsidit, without his help that had committed it. The Ætolians were a most outrageous people, great darters, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans made a league: whereof the Conditions were soon divulged, especially that maine point, concerning the division of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Ætolians should have the Country and Townes; but the Romans the spoyle, and carry away the people to sell for slaves. The Achaens, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make streight alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their uncivill disposition; were much the more averse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greekes account all other Nations except their owne) to make havock of the Country. The same consideration moved also the Lacedæmonians to stand off a while, before they would declare themselves for the Ætolians; whose friendship they had embraced in the late War. The industry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Achaens his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them: especially, at such time, as their owne necessity was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged unto himselfe the Dymeans, by an inestimable benefit: recovering their Town, after it had bin taken by the Romans and Ætolians; and redeeming their people wheresoever they might be found, that had been carried away Captive, and sold abroad for slaves. Thus might he have blotted out the memory of offences past; if the malignity of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and given men to understand, that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts, whereof he was not ashamed; He took Polyxena the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serve to confirme in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make War upon him the second time: for, of that which happened in this their first Invasion, I hold it superfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of Philopœmen Generall of the Achaens: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. Abatell between them, wherein Machanidas is slain.

It happens often, that the decess of one eminent man discovers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood up Philopœmen: whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Achaens redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopœmen: who being then a young man, and having no command; did especiall service to Antigonus at the battell of Sellasia against Cleomenes. Thence forward untill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crus: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldom or never at peace betweene themselves; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of Warre. At his returne home, He had charge of the Horle: wherein he carried himselfe so strictly, travelling with all the Cities of the Confederacie to have his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as also he so diligently trained them up in all exercise of service, that he made the Achaens very strong in that part of their forces. Being afterward chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, Hee had no lesse care to reforme their military discipline throughout, whereby his Countrey might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend upon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the Achaens to cut off their vaine expence expence of bravery, in apparell, household-stuffe, and curious fare, and to bestow that cost upon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to prove the better Souldiers, and furable in behaviour, unto the pride of their furniture. They had served hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast afar off; that were usefull in skirmishing at some distance, or for surprisles, or sudden and hasty Expeditions, whereto Aratus had bin most accustomed. But when they came to handie-strokes, they were good for nothing, so long as they were wholly driven to rely upon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: causing them to arme themselves more weightily, to use a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order, and altered the form of their embattelling: not making the Files so deep as had bin accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might tuse the service of many hands.

Eight moneths were spent of that year, in which he first was Prætor of the Achaens; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedæmon caused him to make trial, how his souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the succesor unto Lycorgus, a man more violent than his foregoer. He kept in pay a strong Army of mercenaries: and he kept them not only to fight for Spacia, but to hold the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behaved him not to take part with the Achaens, that were favorers of liberty; but to strengthen himselfe by friendship of the Ætolians: who, in making Alliances, took no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people also of Lacedæmon, through their inveterate hatred unto the Argives, Achaens, and Macedonians; were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very unwisely. For in seeking to take revenge upon those, that had lately hindred them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindred themselves thereby from recovering the Maftry of their own Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own security, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but alwaies made him ready to fall upon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilst they were enforced, by greater necessity, to turne face another way. Thus had he often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden coming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him faile of his attempts. At the present he was stronger in men, than were the Achaens, and thought his owne men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whilst Philip therefore was busied else-where, he entred the Country of the Manineans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the * Lordship of Peloponnesus, as having stronger friends and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertain him at Maninææ; where was fought between them a great battell. The Tyrant had brought into the field upon Carts a great many of engines, wherewith to beat upon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen sent forth his light armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continual supply still at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achaens and of Machanidas, were drawn up to the fight: being so farre advanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made unserviceable, by the interposition of his own men; in such manner as the Cannon is hindred from doing execution, in most of the battels fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not only by their advantage of number, but (as Polybius well observeth) by surmounting those that were opposed in degree of courage; wherein usually the hired Souldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which live oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, have hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to assure their owne servitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his prosperity, have as good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their own; whereas they that serve under a free State, have no other motive to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the victory, many companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are presently cast, and and therefore such good fellows, will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victory of a Tyrant, makes him stand in need of more such helpers; because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more subjects; and therefore stands in feare of more, that should seeke to take revenge upon him. The stipendiaries therefore of the Acheans, being forced to give ground, were urged so violently in their retreat by those of Machanidas, that shortly they betooke themselves to fight; and could not be staid by any persuasions of Philopemen, but ranne away quite beyond the battell of the Acheans. This disaster had bene sufficient to take from Philopemen the honour of the day; had he not wisely observed the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that error which might restore the victory. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gave chase unto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battell his Lacedemonians; whom he thought sufficient to deal with the Acheans, that were already disheartened by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashness had carried him out of fight, Philopemen advanced towards the Lacedemonians that stood before him. There lay beforepemen advanced towards the Lacedemonians that stood before him. There lay betweene them athwart the Countrie a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedemonians adventured over it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Acheans; who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their own Battell; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further bank, than they were stoutly charged by the Acheans, who drave them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopemen getting over the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopemen knew better how to use his advantage, than Machanidas had done. He suffered not all his Army to disband and follow the chase, but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was over the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come back. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chase, looked very heavily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet with a lustie troupe of Horse about him he made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Acheans in disorder; and to set upon their backs, as they were carelessly pursuing their Victory. But when he and his Companie saw Philopemen readie to make good the bridge against them; then began every one to looke, which way hee might shift for himselfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his company, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage over. He was easily discovered by his purple Cassock, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopemen therefore leaving the charge of the bridge unto another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling upon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as he was getting over it, slew him there with his owne hand. There died in this Battell on the Lacedemonian side about foure thousand: and more than foure thousand were taken prisoners. Of the Achean Mercenaries, probable it is, that the losse was not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they should have need.

§. VI.

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victory the Acheans learned to thinke well of themselves. Neither needed they indeede after a while (such was their discipline and continuall exercise) to account themselves in matter of war inferior to any, that should have brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, he made no great use of them. But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, he studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or verily nearly together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Acheans would have done him service, they must, by helping him to oppress others that never had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deal with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joynd with the Romans and Ætolians in warre against him.

This

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Nobleman, otherwise than as he was ennobled by his own, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune began in Phileteus his Uncle: who being goulded, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a childe, grew afterwards thereby to be the more esteemed as great men in those times repofed much confidence in Eunuches, whose affections could not be obliged unto wives or children. He was entertained into the family of Docimus, a Captaine following Anigonus the first; and after the death of Anigonus, he accompanied his Maister, that brooke himselfe to Lysimachus King of Thrace. Lysimachus had a good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his money and accounts. But when at length he stood in feare of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant; he fled into Asia, where he seized upon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The Towne and money, together with his owne service, he offered unto Seleucus the first, that then was ready to give Lysimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Seleucus, having slaine Lysimachus, dyed shortly after himselfe, before he made use of Phileteus or his money. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus, with the Country round about it; and reigned therein twenty years as an absolute King. He had two brethren of which the elder is said to have bin a poor Carter; and the younger perhaps not much better, before such time they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Phileteus left his Kindome to the elder of these, or to the son of the elder, called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his Kingdome; making his advantage of the dissention between Seleucus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the sons of the second Antiochus. He fought a battell with Hierax, neere unto Sardes, and won the victory. At which time, to animate his men against the Gauls that served under his Enemy, he used a pretty device. He wrote the word "Victory" upon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off: and when the hot liver of the beast that was sacrificed, had clearly taken the print of the letters, He published this unto his Army as a Miracle; plainly foreshewing that the gods would be assitant in that Battell.

After this Victory, he grew a dreadfull enemy to Seleucus: who never durst attempt to recover from him, by Warre, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, when he had reigned two and twenty yeeres, he died by a surfeit of over-much drinke, and left his kingdome to Attalus, of whom we now untreat, that was son unto Attalus the youngest brother of Phileteus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces he restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was grievously molested by Achaus: who setting up himselfe as king against Antiochus the great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his own City of Pergamus: but by the helpe of the Telissages, a Nation of the Gauls, whom he called over out of Thrace, He recovered all that he had lost. When these Gauls had once gotten footing in Asia, they never wanted employment but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters, or interposed themselves, without invitation; and found themselves worke in quarters of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his war against Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condescended; they nevertheless within a while after invaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victory; and used it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increasing, they occupied the Region about Hellepont: where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding unto Attalus. Nevertheless, presuming afterwards upon their strength, they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: in the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect unto Attalus, than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Province, which tooke name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill up the Armies of those, that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posterity of such, as had saved themselves and their Provinces, in the shortlived reigns of the Persians; or in the busie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atossa, sister unto the great King Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the son of that king, whom more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they tooke no pleasure to heare, that Atalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadours to sollicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that solicited not only the Townes upon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadours, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans upon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong, either of himself, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Atalus and the Rhodians; especially with the help of the Ætolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his owne professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men unto the warre, and give it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affaires of those that were more mighty than himselfe. He was too unskillfull, or otherwise too unapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would he needs be seeking new enemies. And he found them such, as he deserved to have them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in misery, and had done him no harme. It behoved him therefore, either to have strained his forces to the utmost in making warre upon them; or in desisting from that injurious course, to have made amends for the wrongs so past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But he, having broken that League of peace, which is of all other the most naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, unlesse they thinke themselves justly provoked; was afterwards too fondly persuaded, that he might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Covenants of peace betweene him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby such Articles of peace can be held inviolable, save onely * by the water of Syx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it binds one partie, or both unto performance, making it apparent, that he shall be a loser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long onely) be presumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans never hearkened after Philip: for necessity made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was the river of Syx dried up: and then could they swear as * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their own selves, even by their good swords, that they had good reason to make war upon him. The voyage of Sopater into Africa, and the present war against Atalus, were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, tooke state upon them nevertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two young Gentlemen of Acarmania entering into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were delivered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous superstition, vainly said to be available unto felicity after this life) discovered themselves by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by mere error, not thinking to have therein done amiss; yet, as it had beene for some haynous crime, they were put to death. All their Country-men at home took this in ill part; and sought to revenge it as a publike injurie, by warre upon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to help them, they entered into Attica: who waited it with fire and sword; and carried thence a great booty. This indignitie stirred up the high-minded Athenians; and made them thinke upon doing more, than they had ability to performe. All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadours to King Atalus; gratulating his happy successe against Philip, and intreating him to visit their Citie. Atalus was hereto the more willing, because he understood that the Roman Embassadours, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to be there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoicing that he continued enemy to Philip, and he being no lesse glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as solemn a pompe as they could devise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the the Romans that were with him, in very loving manner: but towards Atalus himselfe they omitted no point of obsevrance, which their flattery could suggest. At his first comming into the City they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe, saying, That with an evill grace he should recount unto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliver in writing, what he would have to be propounded. He did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed betweene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation unto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilest he with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, he protested, that afterwards it would be vaine to crave his helpe. There needed little intreatie: for they were as willing to proclaim the warre, as he to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and obtained, That unto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noise of warre, wherein little was left unto the Romans for their part; Atalus and the Rhodians taking all upon them. But while these were vainly mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Ætolians to their partie: that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip wonne the Townes of Maronea and Ænus, with many other strong places about the Hellepont. Likewise passing over the Hellepont, he laid siege unto Abydus; and wonne it, though he was faine to stay there long. The towne held out, rather upon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Atalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it selfe against so mighty an enemy. But the Rhodians sent thither only one Quadrivernus Gallie: and Atalus no more than three hundred men, farre too weake an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassadours wondred much at this great negligence of them that had taken so much upon them.

These Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Æmilius, and P. Sempronius, were sent unto Ptolomy Epiphane King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their victory against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thank him for his favour unto them shewed in that war; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Egyptian King was now in the third or fourth yeere of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philopater had done before him) he begane a very young boy. The courtisie for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, that out of Egypt they had lately beene supplied with Corne, in a time of Extreme Dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their own Provinces unable to relieve them. This message could not but bee welcome to the Egyptian: since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Councell for him, should offer to supply the Romans with Corne: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leisure and direction from the Senate, to looke unto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmilius the youngest of them should steppe aside, and visit Philip, to try if he could make him leave the siege of Abydus; which else he was like to carry. Æmilius, comming to Philip, tels him, that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Atalus and the Rhodians, upon whom he made warre, were Confederate with Rome: and the towne of Abydus, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependance upon Atalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Atalus and the Rhodians had made warre upon him: and that he did onely requite them with the like. Doe you also (said Æmilius) require these poor Abydens with such terrible warre, for any like Invasion by them first made upon you? The King was angry to heare himselfe thus taken shore: and therefore he roundly made answer to Æmilius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beauty, and above all, your being a Roman, that makes you thus presumptuous. But I would wish you to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keepe it: If ye doe otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon

Macedon is in matter of warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Embassador; and had the Towne immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died every one of them, and set their Towne on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Governours and Ancients of the City to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which whilst they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger sort; that, by exhortation of the Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that He said, he would grant the Abydeni three daies leisure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the towne; or hazzard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

The Romans decree warre against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poore the Athenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

THis calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerely resembled; though Rome was not alike interested in the quarrell. But to helpe themselves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, even the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that hee should presently imbarke himselfe for Italy, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in five moneths, but in the short space of five dayes sayling. Thus P. Sulpicius the Consul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre upon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrius was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdome, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate voyage of Scipio into Africa; to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Country. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleve, that this war with the Macedonian was both just and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consull halted away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted unto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motives than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were given to the Athenian Embassadors, of their constancie (as was said) in not changing their faith at such times as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not upon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit unto themselves; that any Greece Towne, refusing to sue unto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate, intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts, had reason to give thanks unto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an untrue suggestion, That Philip was making readie for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodian, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to give them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acar-nanians, and consequently with Philip; a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, even to Ptolomy of Egypt, and to the Romans as well as to Attalus and others their neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Nevertheless as it loves to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpicius the Consul were such, as might have argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He failed not about Peloponnesus, but tooke the ready way to Macedon, and landing about the River of Aspus, betwene Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there began the Waite. Soone upon his coming, the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craved his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilst he was far from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliver them.

them. For which cause he sent unto them C. Claudius with twenty gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces he retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: onely some Rovers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Eubæa, and some bands of adventurers out of Corinth, against King Philip, that was Lord of these two townes. The robberies done by these Pyrats & Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than war-like Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrivall of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easly preserved them. As for the Athenians themselves, they that had beene wont, in ancient times, to undertake the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cicil; to make warre upon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subjection, as made them redoubtable unto all the rest; had now no more than three ships, and those open ones, not much better than long boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men, but stood as highly upon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had beene still their owne.

§. X.

The Town of Chalcis in Eubæa taken and sacked by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprize: wasteth the Country about, and makes a journey into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his wife. Philip offers to make warre against Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoileth againe: and provides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes joyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the warre.

Philip returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to give him entertainment, or perhaps before he had well resolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Invaders with all his forces: he received advertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the warre; and make his owne employment better. He grew soone weary of sitting as a Scare-crow, to save the Athenians grounds from spoile; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The towne of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand: and more negligently by the Townes-men, who reposed themselves upon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius having advertisement, failed thither by night, for feare of being descried: and arriving there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. He used no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it, (unlesse he should have left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) He set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all provisions for Warre, which were plentifully filled. Neither were He & his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoile which they carried aboard their ships, and with enlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most security, kept there imprisoned: but, to shew their despight and hatred unto the King, they overthrow and brake in pieces the Statuæ to him there erected. This done, they hasted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit was like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whither when these tidings or part of them, were brought him, though hee saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet he made all haste to take reveng. He thought to have taken the Athenians, with their trusty friends, busie at work in ransacking the town, & loading themselves with spoile: but they were gone before his coming. Five thousand light-armed foot he had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leaving at Chalcis onely a few to bury the dead, He marched from thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not impossible to take his enemies, in the joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the City upon the borders, had not descried him a farr off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither : who found all the Towne asleepe, as fearelesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Citadell to found the Alarme, and with all speede made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there : who seeing the many lights, and other signes of busie preparation usuall in such a case, understood that they had newes of his comming ; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucity of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compassse about by sea, and had no cause of haste) yet having in the town some mercenarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of citizens ; they adventured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make titude of citizens ; they adventured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this ; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardy. He therefore only willed his men to follow his example ; & presently gave charge upon them. In that fight he gave singular prooffe of his valour ; and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, drave them with great slaughter backe into the City. The heat of his courage transported him further than discretion would have allowed, even to the very gate. But he retired without harme taking ; for that they which were upon the Towers over the gate, could not use their casting weapons against him, without much endangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments besides, neere adjoining unto Athens : of which he spared none ; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even unto the sepulchres of the dead. The next day he came the Romans, and some Companies of Antalus his men from Aegina ; too late in regard of what was already past ; but in good time to prevent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinib, and hearing that the Acheans held a Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them unexpected.

The Acheans were devising upon war : which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon : who being started up in the room of Machanidas, did greater mischiefes than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly upon his mercenaries ; and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor ; a greedy extortioner upon those that lived under him ; and one that in his naturall condition finelt rankon upon those that lived under him ; and one that in his naturall condition finelt rankon ly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him ; since his dexterity was no greater in spoiling the men, than hers in fleecing their wives ; whom she would never suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their jewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her property, that he caused an Image to be made, lively representing her ; & apparelled it with such costly garments as she used to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, serving to torment men. Hereof he made use, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling unto him some rich man, of whose money he was desirous ; he would bring him into the roome where this Counterfeit Apega stood, and there use all his art of perswasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speed, but was answered with excuses ; then tooke he the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apega (who sat by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So he ledde him to the Image, that rose up and opened the armes, as it were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yronnayles, the like whereof was also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes : and herewith the griped the poore wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Government. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Aetolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans ; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former warre. Of Philopæmens vertue he stood in feare ; and therefore durst not provoke the Acheans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a farre worse Captaine, was their Prætor, and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged ; Philopæmen being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloved occupation of Warre : then did Nabis fall upon their Territory ; and waisting all the fields, made them distrust their owne safety in the Townes.

Against

Against this Tyrant the Acheans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them ; and had set downe what proportion of Souldiers every City of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse ; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden upon himselfe. With exceeding joy and thanks they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whilst he made warre upon Lacedæmon, He ought not to leave his owne Townes unguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinib, & some Companies into the Ile of Eubœa ; that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediately they found out his device ; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, upon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis, hee brake up the Assembly, with every mans good liking ; whereas in former times, he had beene thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieved the King to have thus failed in his purpose with the Acheans. Nevertheless he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries, & so returned by Corinib backe into Attica. There he met with Philotes one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had beene doing what harme he might unto the Countrey. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Cattle of Eleusine, the Haven of Pyreus, and even the City of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into every of these places ; that he could no more than wreake his anger upon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So he destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble ; which they had in plenty, of their owne ; or, having long agoe benee masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choyce was found. Neither did he only pull all downe : but caused his men to breake the very stones, that they might be unserviceable to their reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus revenged upon Athens, He went home into Macedon : and there made provision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia ; and against the Dardaniens, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infect him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Aetolians : to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Nampaſus, he sent an Embassage, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped upon the River of Apſus. Thence he sent forth Apustius his Lievtenant, with part of the Army, to waste the borders of Macedon. Apustius tooke sundry Castles and Townes ; using such extremity of sword and fire at Amispatia, the first good Towne which he wonne by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, unless they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoile, he was charged in Rere, upon the passage of a brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captain : but the Romans had the better, & killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arrived in safety at their camp. The successe of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet served to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the son of Serdilaidas the Illyrian ; Aminander King of the Albanians, and Bato the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardaniens. They offered their assistance unto the Consul, who thanked them : and said, That he would shortly make use of Pleuratus and Bato, when he entered into Macedon : but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Countrey lay betwene the Aetolians and the Jessaly, might be perhaps available with the Aetolians, to stirre them up against Philip. So the present care was wholly set upon the Aetolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Romans, & Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and said : That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betwene his master and the Aetolians : so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves, without good cause, to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended only to the defence of the Aetolians, and yet notwithstanding had been angry, that the Aetolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore unto the Greeks. For even after the same sort had they lent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards delivered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian tyrants, but now both Syracuse and Messana, were subject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the *Ætoli*ans: who if they drew such masters into Greece, must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and send them such a Moderator, as went every yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, that it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, upon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeeres agoe made the peace which still continued; although that the very same Romans were then against it, who sought to breake it now. It would have troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these objections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were set on by them to speake next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few daies past, made Warre upon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pittifull rehearfall of their owne calamities: and said, that if Philip might have his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athens it selfe, together with Minerva, Jupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to have felt, if the walls and the Roman armes had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Armes, went roundly to the point, in hand. They said, that they had of late made Warre in the *Ætoli*ans behalfe, and that the *Ætoli*ans had without their consent made peace: whereof since the *Ætoli*ans must excuse themselves, by alleging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to give them aide convenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the *Ætoli*ans to take part with them in their war and victory, unless they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their help ere it was desired, were themselves carried into the warre by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the cause, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor shifted them off a while with a dilatory answer: though he told his country-men, That by reserving themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes; That over-much haste was an enemy to good counsaile: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, He passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude upon such business; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was unlawfull to treat of such affaires, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætoli

Philip was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their solicitation of the *Ætoli*ans. Hee thought them hereby disappointed in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappooint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keep the Streights of Pelagonia against the *Dardani*ans;

*Dardani*ans; having with him some of the Kings Councill, to governe both him & his Army. It was judged, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings son, how yong soever, would both encourage his followers, and terrefie the enemies, by making them at least beleve, that hee was not weakly attended. And this may have been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left upon the borders of Ætolia by his father; whom earnest business called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would serve to keepe Attalus with the Rhodian and Roman, from doing harme by Sea, when the Kings backe was turned: who tooke his journey Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the Country of the Deffaretii, a people in the utmost borders of Macedon towards Ilyria, about the mountaines of Candavia; that running along from Hæmus in the North untill they joyne in the South with Pindus, inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in fight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which hee had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven backe into their Campe. Now although it was so, that the King was unwilling to hazzard all at first upon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no lesse unwilling to lose too much in reputation; He made shew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein hee bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and so gave charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains, to provoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behave themselves respectively, as opportunity should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush, having fought upon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him so hotly, that they drove him to an halty flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not staying to let them runne into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the King had some desire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Army, and setting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kinde of help which the Romans had never used before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce above fourescore yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to affright the Romans, who had never seene any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilst possibly some were yet alive, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks have none. Philip had patience to let the Consul brave him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Roman had greater need to fight, than He. Sulpicius was unwilling to lose time: neither could he without great danger, lying so neere the Enemy, that was strong in Horse, send his men to fetch in come out of the fields. Wherefore he removed eight miles off: presuming that Philip would not adventure to meet him on even ground; and so the more boldly he suffered his Forragers to over-runne the Country. The King was nothing sorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: even till their presumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them carelesse. When this was come to passe, he tooke all his horse, and light-armed foot, with which he occupied a place in the mid-way, betwene the Forragers and their Campe. There he stayed in Covert with part of his forces; to keepe the passages that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Country, to fall upon the stragglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scowre the fields, lighted all or most of them upon the King and his companies in their flight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went; went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellows where they saw it needfull: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse divided themselves, accordingly as they met with advertisements upon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was moit of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philips Troupes, that were canvassing the field, tooke their taske where they found it: But the maine bulke of them fell upon the King himselfe. They had the disadvantage; as coming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away: as their fellows also might have beene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and given over in time. But while, not contented with such an harvest, he was too greedy about a poore gleaning; the Roman Legions appeared in fight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to look to their own safetie. They ran which way they could: & (as menthalie lie in waite for others, are seldome heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine under him: and there had he beene cast away, if a loving subject of his had not alighted, mounted him upon his own horse, and delivered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foot was overtaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident rashnes; and the Consul, with as much dulnesse, for his dayes service. A little longer stay would have delivered the King from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needs have retired backe to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought unlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had set upon his Campe, at such time as he fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might have won it. But that Noble Historian, Livie, (as is commonly his maner) hath judiciously observed, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Army lay safe in his Campe; and could not be so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred horse, that it should therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe, he was advertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardaniens, were fallen upon his Country; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Streights. This was it which made him adventure to do somwhat betimes, that he might set the Romans going the sooner, & afterwards looke unto his troublefome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleare himselfe of the Romans, as soone as hee might. And to that purpose hee sent unto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But instead of so doing, hee marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He overtook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little use; being a square battell of pikes, not fit for every ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more servicable in that case. But they were few; and their arrows were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) layd open unto the Consul some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yeelded for feare. But the spoile of these, and of the fields adjoining, was not sufficient to maintaine his Army; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardaniens, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Country. The King sent Athenagoras to waite upon them home; whilest he himselfe went against the Aeolians. For Damocritus the Prator of the Aeolians, who had reserved himselfe and his Nation unto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once & again: as also that Pleuratus & the Dardaniens were fallen upon Macedon; grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before he had beene wise. He perswaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaime warre, joyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made invasion upon Thessaly. They tooke and cruelly cruelly sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might do what they listed. But Philip came upon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay disperfed, was like to have taken their Camp, if Aminander more warie than the Aeolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the same time the Roman Fleet, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken some small Islands in the Aegean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Isle of Euboea; and some other places thereabout. The Towns were given unto Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the Aeolians: the goods therein found were given unto the Romans; and the people, for slaves. Other attempts on that side were hindred either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

§. XII.

Villius the Roman Consul wastes a yeere to no effect. Warre of the Gauls in Italy. An Embassy of the Romans to Carthage, Masaniissa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

Thus the time ran away: and P. Villius a new Consul, tooke charge of the War in Macedon. He was troubled with a mutiny of his oldest Souldiers: whereof two thousand, having served long in Sicily & Africke, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not be suffered to look unto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had served at Cannae: as may seeme by their complaint, of having beene long absent from Italy; whither faine they would have returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is uncertaine. For the History of his yeare is lost: whereof the misse is not great, since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antius, as we finde in Livie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Livie himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could finde no such thing recorded in any good Author; we may reasonably beleeve, that Villius his yeare was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could have beene expected with the Gauls. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had beene able to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted; but saved her selfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamity. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that stayed behinde Asdrubal or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gauls, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadors to the Carthaginians: giving them to understand, That if they were not wearie of the peace, it behooved them to call home, and deliver up, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made war in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps left the message might seeme otherwise to have favoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitive slaves belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walke up and downe in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored back to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Masaniissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Unto Masaniissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure he might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serve in their Warre against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe unto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserve it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That having beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemy, He ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they used not to conferre upon any, save onely upon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authority to make peace with him, was wholly committed unto these Embassadors, upon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him, and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitives: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite, requisite, give satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like unto the Army that was in Macedon. King Masaniſſa would have lent unto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadors, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any disputation, agreed with them upon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre; that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls; they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls; they laide siege unto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came upon them, fought a battaile with them; and overcame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile: and the fruit of the victory was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should have the managing of warre among those Gauls. So was there good leisure to thinke upon the businesse of Macedon: where Philipp was carefully providing to give contentment unto his Subjects, by punishing a bad Counsaillour whom they hated; as also to assure unto himselfe the Acheans, by rendering unto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and training his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, having unprofitably laboured to finde way into Macedon, taking a journey (as Salpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Confull, and had Macedon allotted him for his Province; whose coming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Army.

6. XIII.

The Romans begin to make war by negotiation. T. Quintius winnes a passage against Philip. Thessaly wasted by Philip, the Romans, and Aetolians. The Acheans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treaty of peace, that was vaine. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THE Romans had not bene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their use, to give battaile to the Enemy, as soone as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) upon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they began to learne of the subtle Greekes, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proved. Their Treasury was poore, & stood indebted,* many years after this, unto private men, for part of those monies that had bene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonalty averse from the Macedonian warre; and had thereby driven the Senators, greedy of the enterprize, to make use of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Army, that they might have the lesse need to relie upon their Confederates. So they levied eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latiners) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Confull, into Macedon. Their Navie, and other meanes could well have served, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident unto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home) have bred some jealousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their enemies, more than of their owne Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe unto them, by his Embassadors; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who invaded it; or else that they would not take it uncourteously, that hee quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke unto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to use the aide of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie; and could also bee well contented to afford it; That

That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were; against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deal with Antiochus by Embassadors, and (as common friends unto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an atonement betweene them. In such loving fashion did they now carry themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus, who reciprocally at their inreaty, withdrew his Army from the Kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these termes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the supply decreed unto him; which consisted, for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had served in Spain and Africa. He found Villius the old Conful, (whom at his comming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the river of Apfus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seek their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Dassarettians; or else winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way; they had already two yeeres together mis-spent their time, and bene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victuals; whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get over these Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Thessaly, then should they enter into a plentifull Countrey; and which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a maner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Nevertheless, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the River of Apfus, running along through that valley which alone was open betweene the Mountains, made it all a deep, Maris and unpassable Bogge; a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assailed to climbe in the Mountains: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very easie; he was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of forty dayes.

This long time of rest gave hope unto Philip, that the war might bee ended by composition, upon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epiriots, (among whom he had many friends) that hee and the Confull had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Confull would have him to set all Townes of Greece at liberty; and to make amends for the injuries, which he had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to give liberty to those whom he had subdued of late: but unto such, as had bene long subject unto him and his Ancestors, He thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claime and dominion over them. He also said, That as farre forth as it should appeare that he had done wrong unto any Towne or people whatsoever, He could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme convenient in the judgement of some free State, that had not bene interested in those quarrells. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no judgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparent, that Philip had alwayes bene the Invader; and had not made warre, as one provoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Conful was required to name those Towns, that hee would have to be set at liberty; the first that hee named were the Thessalians: These had bene subjects (though conditionall) unto the Macedonian Kings, ever since the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Thessalians; the King in a rage demanded what sharper condition hee would have laid upon him, had he bene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Confull strove in vaine two or three dayes together, to have prevailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselfe, and could not resolve what course to take: there came to him an Heards-man sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epiriots that favoured the Romans, who having long kept beasts in those Mountaines, was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore undertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should have advantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound:

bound: and being promised a great reward, in case he made good his word, had such Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travelled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for feare of being discovered. When they had recovered the hill-tops, and were above the Macedonians, (though undiscovered by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gave notice of their successe unto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilst these were on they journey, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian; thereby to avert the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained unto the place whither they were sent, he pressed as neere as he could unto the Enemies to the place whither they were sent, he prevailed as little as in former times, Campe, and assailed them in their strength. He prevailed as little as in former times, untill the shoutings of those that ran downe the hill, and charged Philip on the backe, astonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselves to flight. The King, upon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to save himselfe. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: he made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken troops, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians began to stand in feare, lest being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, upon equal ground. Neither was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retreat he could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countre, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better doe, for that he could not stay to use any great compulsion. He also himselfe rooke it very grievously, that he was driven to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitful Countrey, which had ever been well affected unto him: so that a little hinderance did serve, to make him breake off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdom of Macedon.

The Ætolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readinesse to invade Thessaly; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their severall Countreies. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they followed not the occasion, but made all speed, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their harvest, could not finde enough to maintaine his Army. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few dayes since had made shew to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to avoide. T. Quintius wonne Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yielded unto him. Rhage defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recolected his spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, having well-neere spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to prevaile at Rhage; brake up his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his ships of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Haven Towne of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth: which Countrey being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred unto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated betwene Thessaly and other regions, where in he had business, or was shortly like to have. Many Townes in Phocis he wonne by assault: many were yielded up unto him for feare; and within short space he had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wonne two Cities in Eubœa; and afterward laid siege unto Cenchree, an Haven and Arceall of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprize did somewhat helpe forward the Acheans, in their desire to leave the part of Philip: since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, how very shortly should be rendred unto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

But there were other motives, inducing the Acheans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had been long accustomed. For this King had so many waies offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilst being intangled in a dangerous War, he wanted means to hinder the execution of such counsell as they should hold the fittest. His tyrannous practises to make himselfe their absolute Lord: his poisoning of Aratus their old Governour: His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long since to hold him as an necessary evil, even whilst they were unable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopamen, they were grown somewhat confident in their own strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as having him to friend: then did they onely think how evil he was; and thereupon rejoyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It angered him to perceive how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers to take away the life of * Philopamen. But failing in this enterprize; and being detected, he did thereby onely set fire to the Wood, which was thoroughly dry before, and prepared to burn. Philopamen wrought so with the Acheans, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonian. Cyrtidas, a principall man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Arifennus chosen Prætor, who laboured to joyn them in society with the Romans.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadors were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans, making promise, that they should have Corinth restored unto them; if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Acheans was held at Sicyon, to deliberate and resolve in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Acheans to joyn with them in making Warre upon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for this business, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due unto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadors did no way advance their Masters cause. Rather it gave the Acheans to understand, That he, who could be satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe unable to gratifie them in any reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell, who remembering the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late injuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; prevailed against the memory of those old good turnes, which he (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold unto them, and partly had used as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to prevaile in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this War. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entered into society: with the Romans (because no League would be of force, untill the Senate and people had approved it) they forbore to decree any society at the present, untill the returne of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolisians, Dymeans, and Argives, having done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose up out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree; which they could not resist, nor yet with honesty thereto give assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argives had so little thanke; that all the rest of the Acheans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, upon a solemn day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discovered it selfe so plainly, in the behalfe of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Cite into his hands, if they might have any small assistance. Philotes a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither coming on a sudden, and finding the multitude ready to joine with him, He easily compelled the Achaean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth, and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gave him hope to obtaine some good end by Treaty, whilst as yet with his honour he might seeke it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consul would shortly be chosen; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect unto himselfe; and therefore thought it best, since more could not be done, to pre-dispose things unto a Conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay then called the Malian or Lamian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulf of Ziton, in the Aegean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus with Aminander the *Atbamani*an Ambassador of Attalus; the Admiral of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Ætolians and Achaens. Philip had with him some few of his owne Captaines, and Cycladas, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he said) none but the immortal Gods: yet misdoubting some treacherie in the Ætolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans, were, That he should set all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliver up to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewise whatsoever he held of theirs in Ilyria; and whatsover about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptolomy then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made, entire of Ships, Townes, and Temples by him taken and spoyled in the late War between them. The Rhodians would have againe the Country of Peraea, lying over against their Iland; as also that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of divers Townes about the Hellespont, and other Havens of their friends. The Achaens desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not unjustly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their consent. The Ætolians took upon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, even out of the whole Country, leaving it free; and withall to deliver up unto them, whatsoever he held that had at any time beene theirs. Neither were they herewithall content: but insolently declaymed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessaly; corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the Victors, by destroying, when hee was vanquished, those Townes, which else they might have gotten. To answer these malapart Ætolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to be rowed nearer the shore. But they began to plie him afresh: telling him that he must obey his betters, unless he were able to defend himselfe by force of Armes. He answered them (as he was much givento gybing) with sundry scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Roman Consul understand, what manner of companions these Ætolians were. For he said, That he had often deale with them; as likewise the best of the Greeks; desiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take spoyle from spoyle: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Ætolia out of Ætolia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as Warre happened betwene their friends, to hold up the quarrell by sending Voluntaries to serve on both sides, that should spoyle both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, Hee said it was strange that the Ætolians should bee so carefull thereof, since divers Tribes of their owne, which he there named, were indeed no Grecians: wherefore hee would faine know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make slaves of those Ætolians, which were no Greekes. Titus hereat smiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Ætolians well rated up; touching whom he began to understand, how odious they were in all the Country. As for that generall demand of setting all Greece at liberty, Philip acknowledged, that it might well become the greatnesse of the Romans; though he would also consider, what might become his owne dignity. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other pettie Estates, should thus presume, under countenance of the Romans, to take upon them, as if by their great might hee should bee thereunto compelled: it was, hee said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Achaens hee charged with much ingratitude; reciting against them some Decrees of their owne; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Nevertheless he said, that he would render Argos unto them: but as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himselfe.

Thus

Thus he addressed himselfe wholly to the Roman Generall; unto whom if he could give satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late War (he said) was onely defensive; they having beene the offerers: or if he gave them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne-in-law; neither did he see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, he had cut downe the Grove, and pleasant walkes thereabouts: what could he doe more, than send Gardners thither with young plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus he jested the matter out: but offered nevertheless, in honour of the Romans, to give backe the Region of Peraea to the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof hee had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to thinke upon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Counsell, wherewith to advise about them. For your being so ill provided of Counsell (said Titus) you may even thanke your selfe; as having murdered all your friends, that were wont to advise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, untill it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the weightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolve. But it was beleevd, that he thereby sought to abridge the Ætolians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that he desired conference in private with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would give the Achaens both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render unto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Ætolians, that he would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsover they did challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaymed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which he now rendred up. The noyse that they made came to Philips eare: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, he would suffer himselfe to be perswaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken unto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it; if they could like well of those Conditions which he had already tendred; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadors to Rome, where he would referre himselfe to the courtesie of the Senate.

This was even as Quintus would have it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the Warre. So he easily prevailed with the rest, to assent hereunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time unfit for service in the War; and since, without authority of the Senate, he should be unable to proceed resolutely either in Warre or Peace. Further he willed them to send their severall Embassadors to Rome, which intimating unto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the rest, he perswaded King Aminander to make a journey to Rome in person: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadors, would serve to make his owne actions more glorious in the City. All this tended to procure that his own Command of the Army in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authority, partly by good reasons which they alledged unto the Senate.

The Embassadors of the Greekes, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victory, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in undertaking to set Greece at liberty. But this (they said) could never be effected; unless especiall care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in fervility; that the Senate agreed to have it even so as they desired. When therefore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the midst of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would yield up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the

King

King had given them no direction or commission what to say or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said he did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadors have truly said, That neither the Etians, Acheans, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yielded up. For which of them indeed could make any claime to either of these Towns? As for Corinth, whereto the Acheans had some right; (though their right were no better, than that, having stolne it from One Macedonian king in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain unto an Other) Philip had already confederated to give it back unto them. And this perhaps would have been alledged, even against the Greeks, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might have had the honor to conclude the war, if a successor had been decreed unto him. But since he was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadors into Greece, cared to give care unto any talke of peace.

Philip, seeing that his Acheans had forsaken him, and joyned with their common enemies; thought even to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe unto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeares past, since the Lacedaemonians under Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had been almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Acheans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though stiling himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Acheans: and therefore seemed to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Town of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should bee assigned over into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serve to tie him fast unto the Macedonian. Philoctes the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a freight alliance with the Lacedaemonian, by giving some daughters of his owne in marriage unto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos, unless by decree of the Citizens themselves hee might be called into it. Hereabout Philoctes dealt with the Argives: but found them so averse, that, in open assembly of the people, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought he had thereby a good occasion to rob and fliee them. So he willed Philoctes, without more ado, to make over the Town which he was ready to receive. Philoctes accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gave him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argives: who for very love had forsaken the Acheans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, understanding how things went, fled out of the City at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that stayed behinde, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of money was laid upon all those that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more ado; but if any stood long upon the matter: or played the thieves in purloining their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely, such as might serve to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating all debts, and dividing the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath been an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soon as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to joine with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the pains to crosse over the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soon agreed (though King Aistalos, who was present with the Consul, made some cavill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent unto the Roman, sixe hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also he agreed with the Acheans, upon a Truce for foure moneths, reserving the final conclusion of peace between them untill the War of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

§. XIII.

§. XIII.

The battell at Cynoscephale, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as soone as he understood that he was appointed to have Command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that War; meant afterwards wholly to relie upon himselfe.

Titus had in his Army about fixe and twenty thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemy intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessaly, and thereupon addressed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to have met unawares, neare unto the City of Phera: where the vancurers on both sides discovered each other; and sent word thereof unto their severall Captains. But neither of them were over hasty to commit all to hazzard upon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discovery. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally into their severall Camps, with little advantage unto either side. The Country about Phera was thick set with Trees: and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles; which made it improper for service of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remove back into Scotusa, in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully served with all necessaries. Titus conceived aright his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it onely to waste the Country. There lay between them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other took. Nevertheless they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them understood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging where hee found it by chance. Then sent they forth discoverers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worke. But Philip anon sent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Etians had not been desperate, the Romans their fellows had been driven back into their Camp. Yet all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: so that Titus himselfe was faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a litle discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in fight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose to put the fortune of a battell in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thick and tumultuously, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his owne, if hee could use an occasion, the like whereof he should not often finde. This caused him to alter his purpose: inso much as he embattelled his men; and climbed up those hills, which, for that the knops thereon had some resemblance unto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynoscephale. As soone as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his owne light armature were busie in fight, almost at the very Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. Hee had also liberty to choose his ground, as might serve best his advantage: forasmuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commodity he could make no great use: the roughness of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, serving nothing apply for his Phalanx. Nevertheless hee found convenient roome, wherein to marshall the one part of his Army: and gave order unto his Captaines, to follow with the rest; embattelling them as they might. Whilest hee was doing this: He perceived that his Horsemen and light armature began to shrink; as being fallen upon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to recoyle. He sent forward to helpe them: and they no lesse hastily draw unto him for succour; having the Romans not far behinde them.

As the Legions began to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult piece of worke. For this Phalanx being a great square battell of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now used in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner used, as are ours; was not to be refitted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe held together undissolved. The Macedonians were embattelled in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvell if the Romans gave back: every one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come nearer to the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to re-medie it; was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while he observed, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much unevennesse of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) upon desire either of beholding the paltme, or of seeming to be partakers in the work, ran foolishly along by the side of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder Hee made great and present use. He caused the right wing of his Battell to march up the Hill against these ill-ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispart what should be done in such a case, than well advised what to doe; as having no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeed if they should have done their best, it could not have served; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons unusefull. For let it be supposed, that Philip having fixe and twenty thousand in his Armie (as he is said to have been equall to the Enemy in number) had foure thousand fourteene thousand Pikes; whereof he himselfe had embattelled the one halfe in a Phalanx; the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is ready now to charge. The Phalanx having usually fixteene in file, must, when it consisted of seven thousand, have neare foure hundred and forty in ranke: but foure hundred would serve, to make a Front long enough; the other forty or seven or thirty files might be cut off, and as reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Quintius doth, to every man of them three foote of ground: this Front must have occupied twelve hundred foote, or two hundred and forty paces; that is, very neare a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champaine, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessity dis-joyne this close battell of the Phalanx; was not every where to be found. Here at Cynosephale Philip had so much room, as would onely suffice for the one halfe of his men; the rest were faine to stand still and looke about them, being hindered from putting themselves in order, by the roughnesse of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from coming up into them; nor found any difficulty in mastering those enemies, whose feet were in a manner bound by the discommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to give back; and the coming on of the Legions, to betake themselves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonel, seeing the victory on that part assured, left the prosecution of it unto others: and being followed by twenty Ensignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainly helpfull to making of the victory compleate. Hee considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was run on so farre: as that himselfe, with his fellows, in mounting the hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand, and making downe the hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rere. The hindermost rankes of the Phalanx, all of them indeede save the first five, were accustomed, when the battels came to joyning, to carry their pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at this present. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it served neither for offence nor defence, except onely in front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when hee was to fight with Darius in Mesopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the foure sides of it were as so many fronts looking sundry ways, ways, because he expected that he should be encompassed round: yet it is to be understood, that herein he altered the usuall forme; as also at the same time he embattailed his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turne their weapons which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexanders men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keep their owne ground; not being able to follow upon the enemy, unless their hindmost rankes could have marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such provision for resistance. Therefore his men, being other wise unable to help themselves, threw down their weapons & fled. The king himselfe had thought untill now, that the fortune of the battell was every where alike, and the day his own. But hearing the noise behind him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of horse, to see how all went; when he beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he presently betook himselfe to flight. Neither staid he afterwards in any place (except only a small while about Tempe, there to collect such as were dispersed in this overthrow) untill he was gotten into his own kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battell, about seven hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and five thousand taken prisoners.

§. XV.

T. Quintius falleth out with the Ætolians, and grants truce unto Philip, with conditions upon which the peace is raised. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greekes. The Romans quarrell with Antiochus.

The Ætolians wonderfully vaunted themselves; and desired to have it noyed through all Greece, that the victory at Cynosephale was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie by sacking the Macedonian Camp, whilst the Romans were busied in the chase. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, & at their ravenous condition, purposed to reach them better manners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceived, That by using them with any extraordinary favour, he should greatly offend the rest of his confederates in Greece; who detested the Ætolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battell Titus made haste unto Larissa, a Citie in Thessalie, which he presently tooke. Before his coming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoever in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many he forgot not to provide for the safetie of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceive, that he gave them as already lost. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their Neighbors, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the town of Leucas, bordering upon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleet, and very soone after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred to the Ætolians ever true to Philip, gave up themselves unto the Romans, hearing of the victory at Cynosephale. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Pæreea, a Region of the Continent over against the Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treaty of Peace. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greekes: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leasure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, and some helpe which they borrowed of the Acheans and other their friends, gave battell to Democrates the kings Lievtenant, wherein they had the victory, and consequently recovered the whole Province. It angered Philip worse than all this, that the Dardaniens gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his kingdome; wasting and spoyling, as if all had bin abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all haste of six thousand foot and five hundred horse: wherewith coming upon them, he drave them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the kingdome. Which done he returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise He had successe answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdom to yeeld unto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Limnem and Demofthenes with

with Cycliadas the banished Achean, in whom he reposed much confidence, Embassadors unto Titus. These had conference a long while in private, with Titus and some of the Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seemed that they had Commission, to referre all unto Titus his owne discretion; as Philip himselfe in few dayes after did. There was granted unto him a Truce for fifteen dayes: in which time, the King himselfe might come and speake with the Roman Generall. In the mean season many suspicious rumours went of Titus, as if he had bene corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of these bruits the Aiolians were chiefe authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honestie, where profit led them a wrong way, judged alike of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters unto his Associates; willing them to have their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treaty should be held. There when they were all assembled, they entered into consultation before the Kings arrivall, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every estate in particular. The poor king Aminander besought them all, & especially the Romans, that they would thinke upon him; and, considering his weakenesse which he confessed, make such provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger upon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander, one of the Aiolians: who commending Titus so far as he had thus assembled the Confederates to advise upon their own good, and had willing them to deliver their minds freely: added, That in the maine of the purpose which he had in hand, he was utterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, he could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he said, none other end to be made of the war, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the faire promises made by Titus himselfe unto the Greeks, than the chasing of Philip quite out of his kingdome. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Aiolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seeke the utter destruction of any King, or 30 Nation, at such time as they first made warre with them; untill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessity, to take such a rigorous course. And hereof the alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victory, to generous minds, was only an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publike benefit of Greece, it was (he said) expedient, that the kingdome of Macedon should be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it should be utterly destroyed: forasmuch as it served as a barre to the Thracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other salvage Nations, which would soone overflow the whole continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld unto those demands, wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reason to deny him peace. As for 40 the Aiolians: if they thought otherwise, it should be at their owne pleasure, to take counsell apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Aiolians, to say, that all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no lesse than he had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leave his babbling, saying, That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip, were he never so desirous, should thenceforth not have it in his power to molest the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus used friendly: and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded unto all that had bene required at his hands; offering yet further to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Aiolian, insulting over him, said it was to be hoped, that he would then at length give up to the Aiolians a many of Townes, (which he there named) bidding him speake whether he would or no. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himselfe, said it should be otherwise. These were Thessalian Townes, and should be all free: one of them only excepted, which not long agoe had refused to commit it self to the faith of the Romans; and therefore should now be given to the Aiolians. Hereat Phaneas cried out, that it was too great an injury, thus to be defrauded of the Townes that had sometime belonged unto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Covenant between him and the Romans, all the townes taken ought to be their own, and the Romans to have nothing save the pillage & captives. It is true, that there had bin such a condition in the former war: but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soon as the Aiolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to understand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be delivered into subjection of the Aiolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted with these angry passages between the Roman and the Aiolians: neither had they great reason to feare any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in behalfe of those Thessalian, to give them liberty, though they had stood out against him, even till very fear made them open their gates. Wherefore they offered not themselves; but gave their consent willingly unto a Truce for foure Moneths.

Townes

The chiefe cause that moved Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custome by him before alledged, was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an army from Syria; and drawing neere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motive; even the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the war should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alledging frivolous matter of their owne suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the war. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassadors of Philip, offering to stand to whatsoever was demanded; and the letters of Titus, pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side; and the importunitie of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as soone as the Army was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assembly of the People; by whose sovereignty authority it was concluded, that Peace should be granted to the King. So ten Embassadors were sent from Rome 30 over into Greece: in which number were they that had bin Consuls before Titus: and it was ordained by their advice, that Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very faine have retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demeirias, untill the estate of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally, Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred unto the Acheans; and all the other Greek townes which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored unto liberty.

The Conditions of the Peace granted unto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next * Isthmian Games, He should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greek * Exempti Eo. townes which he held, and conigne them over to the Romans: That he should deliver up unto them all Captives that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his 40 ships of warre, referring to himselfe onely five of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatnesse, wherein sixteen men laboured at every oare: Further, that he should pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres following; by even portions. Hereto * Livie adds, That he was forbidden to make warre out of Macedon, * Liv. lib. 33. without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he observed this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents he had already delivered to Titus, together with his younger son Demeirius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the money, and his sonne, should be restored backe unto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as young Demeirius, who, together with those foure hundred talents, was given for hostage, remained still in custody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus unto Prusias King of Bithynia: giving him to understand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Cians, most miserably spoyled and oppressed by Philip, to gratifie this Bithynian his son-in-law, should be restored to liberty, and permitted to enjoy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their nation did. What effect effect these letters wrought, it was not greatly material; since the Romans were shortly busied with Aniobus, in such wife, that they had not leasure to examine the conformity of Prusias to their will.

All Greece rejoiced at the good bargain which Timus had made with Philip. Only the Ætolians found themselves agreed that they were utterly neglected: which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Bœotians continued to favour the Macedonians; and thereby occasioned much trouble unto themselves. There were some among them well affected to the Romans: who, seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint unto Timus; saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had borne unto him; unless at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor, which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Timus refused to have a hand in the execution, yet nevertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves undiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confelld by those which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoever they durst not take Armes against them, yet such of them as they found straggling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrey. This was detected within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Timus requires of the Bœotians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred soldiers, which he had lost by them, to have paid unto him five hundred Talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadours to the Acheans and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithall he falls to waiving their country; and beseegeth two such towns of theirs, as did seeme to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Acheans and Athenians (especially of the Acheans, who offered, if he needed them, to help him in this war; yet besought him rather to grant peace unto the Bœotians) prevailed so far with him, that he was pacified with thirty Talents, and the punishment of such as were known offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some a-38
mong them rejoicing that they were free from the Macedonians; others greatly doubting that the Romans would prove a worse neighbour. The Ætolian would have bin glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumours abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their own hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceive, that this Macedonian war served as an introduction to the War to be made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progreffe of bad rumors, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were never without great solemnity and concourse; Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Se- 40
nate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the General, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their own Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Achaëans of Phthiotis, Magnesiens, Thessalians, and Perrebeians. The suddennesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout, yet presently they cried out to heare it again, as if they durst scarce credit their own ears.
The Greekes were Crafts-masters in the Art of giving thanks, which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-neere smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greeks, was like to be much more available unto the Romans y^e in their warre against Antiochus, than could have beene the possession of a few Townes yea or of all those Provinces which were named in the Proclamation. Upon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gave audience to Hagesanax and Lysias, king Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they willed to signifie unto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstain from the free cities in Asia, and not vex them with warres also to refore what-soever he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomy or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe over his Army into Europe; adding adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talke with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises unto the Greeks; so the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gave unto the Aeolians; whom they thought it no wisdom to offend overmuch, being shortly to take a greater work in hand. The Acheans of Phibiotie they annexed unto the Thessalians; all save the town of Thebes in Phibiotie, the same which had bin abandoned by T. Quimius to the Aeolians in the last Treaty with Philp. The Aeolians contended very earnestly about Pharsalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and rejected unto the Senate; for howsoever somewhat the Council might favor them, yet was it not meet that they should have their will, as it were in despite of Tim. So the Acheans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, & Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeed, (though the Romans yet while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achean common-wealth, enjoyed their liberty in as absolute manner as they could desire. To Pleurtus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philp; and upon Amanander were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philp during this war; to reign in them & the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Abamantians. The Rhodians had bin their owne Carvers. Anialus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Tim in Council, would have given the towns of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubaea, to his son and successor King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubaeans, should be suffered to enjoy their liberty. Orestis, a little Province of the kingdom of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yielded unto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at liberty, and made a free estate by it self.

These businesſes being diſpatcht, it remained, that all care ſhould be uſed, not how to avoid the war with King Antiochus, but how to accompliſh it with moſt ſafe and proſperity. Wherefore Embaſſadors were ſent, both to Antiochus himſelfe, to pick matter of quarrell; and about unto others, to pre-diſpoſe them unto the aſſiſting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre againſt this King the Romans now had, or ſhortly after found: aſſo how their Embaſſadors and Agents dealt and ſped abroad; I referre unto another place.

CHAP. V

§. I.

What Kings of the races of Selencus and Ptolomie reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

S Eleucus Nicæor, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, dyed in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; having (as is said) been warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fallall place of his death. But I never have read that any mans life hath bene preserved, or any mischance avoided by the predictions of such Divellish Oracles. Rather I beleeve, that many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, have bene ante-dated by their Priests; or by others which deviled them after the event.

Amiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloved of his Father: who surrendred unto him his owne wife Sratonica, when he understood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolomie Ceraunus had great cause to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not be unrevengeed by this his Successor.

But

But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with faire words, containing himselfe within Asia; and letting Ceraunus enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the blood of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queene Stratonice in his Fathers life, yet out of modesty he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous love was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that revenge; whereunto Nature should have urged him. Afterwards he had wars with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Alto Lumarus and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gauls, were set upon him by the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great battell: wherein, though otherwise the enemies had all advantage against him, yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their horses and them, he won the Victory. He tooke in hand an enterprize against Ptolomie Philadelphus: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he soon gave it over. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldean dedicated his History of Assyria; the same which hath since bin excellently falsified by the Frier Annianus. He left behind him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie & ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeer of the kingdom of the Greeks, when he had reigned nineteene yeeres.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vaine and impious title given to him, by flattery of the Milesians; whom he delivered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolomie Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolomie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierome and other Interpreters have understood that Prophecie of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South shall come to the King of the North to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Ptolomie Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Aspinie) a very excellent Prince: howsoever, the worst of all that race. It was He, that built, and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, He sent unto Eleazar, then high Priest of the Jewes, for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefites of this King unto the Jewes had formerly bene very great: for he had set at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in slavery throughout all Egypt; and he had sent unto the * Temple of God in Jerusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar, yielding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolomie caused to be translated into Greek, by seventy two of the most grave and learned persons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventie, Jesus the sonne of Syrach, is thought by Gombard to have bene one: who that he lived in this Age, it seemes to me very sufficient-ly proved by Janfenius, in his Preface unto Ecclesiasticum. The whole passage of this businessse between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as Josephus affirms) by Aristeus that was employed therein. Fortie yeeres Ptolomie Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he joyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloved of his people, and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had bene in his former yeeres: in which time he boasted, that he alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had bin referred into his honourable deeds, it might have stood with reason: otherwise, the Gowt, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his owne error. He was the first of the Kings, derived from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with the Romans: as also his Off-spring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted up.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolomie. After his second marriage, he used his first wife with no better regard, than if shee had bene his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet adventured not to seeke revenge; untill her owne sonne Seleucus Callinicus was of ability to be king. This was two or three yeeres after the death of Ptolomie Philadelphus: at what time she poisoned her husband Theos; and, by permission of Seleucus her son, murdered Berenice.

Berenice, together with a sonne that she had borne to Antiochus, Justine reports, that Berenice saved her selfe, together with the yong Prince her child, a while in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not only some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolomy Evergetes, King of Egypt, came to rescue her with an Army; though too late, for she was slaine before.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding unto his Father, that had fifteene yeeres bene King, began his reigne. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they discovered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would have bene much endangered, if Ptolomy Evergetes, who came against him, had not bene drawne backe into his owne Countrey, by some Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolomie, in defence of their owne King: but rather they sided with the Egyptian, who tooke Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invasion, by occasion of those domestick troubles which recalled Evergetes home into Egypt; went about a dangerous piece of worke, even to make Warre upon his owne subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had bin much better, by well deserving, to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet he prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himselfe any other hope, if that should miscarry. Herein he embarked himselfe; and putting to Sea, did meet with such a tempest, as devoured all save himselfe, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, having left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned neverthelesse to his great good; as anon after it seemed. For when his subjects understood in what sort the gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate; and, presuming that he would thenceforth become a new man, offered unto him their service with great alacritie. This revived him, and filled him with such spirit; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deal with the Egyptian, he made ready a mighty Army for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had bene at Sea. Hee was vanquished by Ptolomy in a great battell: whence he escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late shipwracke. Having therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the enemy would soone be at his heeles; He wrote unto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeeres old, but extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himselfe great. Hee levied a mighty Army of the Gauls; wherewith he set forward to help his brother, or rather to get what he could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolomie being advertised: and having no desire to put himselfe in danger more than he needed; tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeeres. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian War, but his brother Antiochus came upon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to have the better Army. So Seleucus was vanquished againe; and saved himselfe with so few about him, that hee was verily supposed to have perished in the battell. Thus did Gods Justice take revenge of those murders by which the Crowne was purchased; and settled (as might have bene thought) on the head of this bloody King, Antiochus was very glad to heare of his brothers death, as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gauls, his Mercenaries, were gladder than hee. For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsell against him, and devised how to stripe him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should be best pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransom himselfe with money, as if he had bene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended but little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to try his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great marvel, since he had great reason to stand in no lesse feare of the Gauls, his own souldiers, than of the enemy with whom he had to deale. After this, Eumenes won much in Asia; whilst Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battell, fought between the brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which surname was given him, because he sought his prey upon every one, without care whether he were provoked or not) soared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaules. Having fercht a great compasse through Mesopotamia and Armenia. He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes tooke him up. He was entertained very lovingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to be- tray him. This he soone perceived: and therefore beooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to bestow himselfe upon Ptolomy; his owne conscience telling him, what evill he had meant unto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelity can finde no sure harbour. Ptolomy well understood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him up in close prison: whence though by meanes of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of theeves, by whom he was murdered. Neere about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Arfaces founder of the Parthian Kingdome: where in his evill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Arfaces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, having every way given him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his neck by a fall from his horse, and so ended his unhappy reigne of twenty years. He had to wife Laodice, the sister of Andromachus, one of his most trusty Captains: which was father unto that Acheus, who making his advantage of this affinity, became shortly after (as he stiled himselfe) a King; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the World in those parts. By Laodice he had two sons; Seleucus the third, surnamed Cerannus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Cerannus reigned only three years; in which time he made War upon Attalus the first, that was king of Pergamus. Being weak of body through sickness, and in want of money, He could not keep his men of War in good order: and finally he was slain by treafon of Nicanor and Apaturnus a Gaul. His death was revenged by Acheus, who slew the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Army: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus the brother of Seleucus being then a Child.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reigne. Of Ptolomy Euergetes, and Philopater, Kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopater. The rebellion of Molo: an expedition of Antiochus against him. The recontinuance of Antiochus his Egyptian war: with the passages between the two Kings: the victory of Ptolomy, and peace concluded. Of Acheus, and his rebellion; his greatness, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fiftene years old, when he began his reigne, which lasted fixe and thirty years. In his Minority, He was wholly governed by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithfull servants. This vile quality in a Counsellor of such great place, how harmful it was unto his Lord, and finally unto himselfe; the successe of things will shortly discover.

Soon after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolomy Euergetes King of Egypt died; and left his heire Ptolomy Philopater, a yong Boy likewise, as hath elsewhere been remembred. This was that Euergetes, who releevd Aratus & the Acheans: who afterwards took part with Chloemene; and lovingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed unto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magus. He was the third of the Ptolomies; and the last good king of that race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given to him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoyle which he brought home, after his vi-

etories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when he conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to have made War upon the Jewes, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meer covetousnesse of money, refused to pay unto him his yearly tribute of 20. talents: but he was pacified by the wisdom of Josaphus a Jew, to whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged unto him in those parts of Syria which he held. For Calefryria, with Palestina, and all those parts of the Country that lay nearest unto Egypt, were held by the Egyptians; either as having fallen to the share of Ptolomy the first: at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battell at Issus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublesome and unhappy reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages between the Ptolomies and the Seleucids; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolomy Euergetes reigned fix and twenty years, and dyed towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that which we finde in the Prologue unto Jesus the son of Syrach his book, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Syrachides there saith that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth year, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty years were the years of Jesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsellor, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord unto War against the Egyptian; for the recovery of Calefryria and the Countries adjoyning. This counsell was very unseasonably given, when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and sought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Country. Nevertheless Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained stiffely, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captaine, other Captaines that were faithfull; whilst He in person made Warre upon one, that was like himselfe, a King. No man durst gaine: say the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenatas an Achean, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebell; whilst in the meane season an Army was preparing for the Kings expedition into Calefryria. The King having marched from Apamia to Laodicea, and to over the Defarts into the Vally of Masfius, between the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Etolian, that served under Ptolomy. So he consumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenatas, his Captain, was destroyed with his whole Army; and Molo hereby become Lord of all the Country, as far as unto Babylon.

Xenatas, whilst he was yet on his journey, and drew neare to the River of Tygris; received many advilements, by such as fled over unto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wils, drawne by their Commanders to beare arms against their King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leave him in time of necessity. Xenatas therefore making thew, as if he had prepared to passe the River by Boats in face of his Enemy; left in the night time such as he thought meet to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Army went over Tygris, in a placetenne miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to give impediment: but hearing that Xenatas could not so bee stopped, Hee himselfe dislodged, and tooke his journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne souldiers: or whether thereby to deceive his Enemy; the great folly of Xenatas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenatas, having borne himselfe proudly before, upon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced unto this charge; did now presume that all should give way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of using the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Campe: or rather he commanded them so to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish up themselves against the journey, which he intended to take the next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Army, which he had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily returne the same night. Wherefore understanding what good rule the Kings men kept : he made such haste backe unto them, that he came upon them early in the morning ; whilst they were yet heaue with the Wine and other good cheare that they had spent at supper. So Xenias and a very few with him, resisted fighting in defence of the Campe : the rest were slaughtered without making resistance, and many of them ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Camp on the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Molo the Captains flying thence, to save their own lives. In the heat of this victory, the Rebell marched unto Selencia, which he presently took : and, mastering within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Country downe to the red-Sea, or Bay of Persia. He halted unto Susa ; where at his first coming, he won the Citie : but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned backe to Selencia, there to give order concerning this businesse.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Marfius ; filled him with great sorrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counsell what to doe in this needfull case ; and was well advised by Epigenes, the best man of Warre he had about him, to let alone this enterprize of Calosyria ; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This counsell was put in execution with all convenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soon after slain, by the practice of Hermias ; who could not endure to heare good counsell given, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the journey against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any oddes which he had of the Rebell in strength. Molo distrusted his owne followers : and thought, that neither his late good successesse, nor any other consideration, would serve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience ; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him to assault the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discovered by some that fled over from him to the King. This caused him to returne backe to his Campe : which by some error, tooke alarme at his returne ; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in sight. The King was thus forward in giving battell to Molo, upon confidence which he had that many would revolt unto him. Neither was he deceived in this his beliefe. For not a few men, or Ensignes : but all the left wing of the enemy, which was opposite unto the King, changed side forthwith as soon as ever they had myght of the Kings person ; and were ready to doe him service against Molo. This was enough to have won the victory : but Molo shortned the work, by killing himselfe ; as did also divers of his friends, who for feare of torments, prevented the Hang-man with their owne swords.

After this Victory came joyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married unto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a sonne. Fortune seemed bountifull unto the King : and therefore he purposed to make what use hee could of her friendly disposition whilst it lasted. Being now in the Easterne parts of his Kingdome, He judged it convenient to visit his frontiers, were it only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered upon him. Hereunto his Counsellor Hermias gave assent : not so much respecting the Kings honour, as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe. For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualty : then made he no doubt of becoming Protector to the yong Prince and thereby of lengthening his owne Government. Antiochus therefore went against Artabaxanes, who reigned among the Atropatians ; having the greatest part of his kingdome situate betwene the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearefull ; and therefore yielded unto whatsoever conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay upon him. So in this journey Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him ; and then returned homewards. Upon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias, informing him truly how odious he was to the people ; and how dangerous he would be shortly unto the Kings owne life. Antiochus beleeveth this, as having long suspected the same Hermias ; but not daring for feare of him to utter his suspicions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden : which was done, he being trained forth by a sleight, a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to have used so much art in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howsoever he seemed gracious whilst he was alive : yet they that for feare had bene most obsequious to him him, whilst he was in case to doe them hurt, vvvas as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as he had deserved, when once they were secure of him : Yea, his wife and children, lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the vvives and children of the Citizens ; whose indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that it had bene concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these expeditions which hee tooke in hand ; was bold to let a Diademe upon his owne head, and take upon him as a King. His purpose was to have invaded Syria : but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quite the enterprize ; and studie to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achæus ; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken of these his traiterous purposes : but wrote unto him, signifying that he knew all, and upbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these meanes he emboldned the Traytor : who being already detected, might better hope to maintain his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recover Calosyria, or what else hee could, of the Dominions of Ptolomie Philopater in those parts. He began with Selencia, a very strong Citie neare to the mouth of the River Orantes ; which ere long he wonne, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Selencia, whereto Antigonus the Great, who founded it, gave the name of Antigonæ : but Selencus getting it shortly after, called it Selencia ; and Ptolomy Evergetes having lately wonne it, might if it had pleased him, have changed the name unto Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endlessse memoriall unto their names, by vvorkes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue ; which therefore no longer are their owne, than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodorus the Ætolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Calosyria in the behalfe of Ptolomy ; was now grown forry, that he had used so much faith & diligence in service of an unthankfull and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenary, he began to have regard to his owne profit : which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe unto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthy of these two Kings ; He offered to deliver up unto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrrus and Ptolemais. Whilst he was devising about this treason, and had already sent messengers to king Antiochus ; his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull than himselfe. But Antiochus hastning to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way : and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrrus and Ptolemais, with a good Fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Havens : but of so many other Townes in that Countrey, as emboldned him to thinke upon making a journey into Egypt it selfe. Agathocles and Sosibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time : Ptolomie himselfe being loth to have his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safety of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make provision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be, for the Warre : and nevertheless, at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this businesse, Embassadors from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Ætolians ; according to the usuall courtesie of the Greeks, desiring to take up the quarrell.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Sosibius : who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the Warre : wherein these two Counsellors perswaded themselves reasonably, that the victory would be their own ; if they could get, for money, a sufficient number of the Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Governours of Egypt were to be at quiet : whereunto he gave the readier beliefe, not onely for that he knew the disposition of Ptolomie, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadors, coming from Memphis, discoursed unto him all after one maner ; as being all deceived by the cunning of Agathocles and his fellow : Antiochus therefore having wearied himselfe, at the long siege of a Town called Dura, which he could not win : and being desirous to refresh himselfe and his Army in Selencia, during the winter which then came on ; granted to the Egyptian a Truce for foure moneths, with promise that he would be ready to hearken unto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would faine have seemed, but onely to lull his enemies asleepe, whilst he took time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open himselfe; and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptian would have used, He used himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the year better served, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld unto him, since Ptolome provided not for their defence. Nevertheless, he gave audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himselfe well, to dispute about the justice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were just or no. He said, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolome the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could winne it from Antigonus, should be given in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargain was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battell at Ipsus. But Ptolome's men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said that Ptolome the sonne of Lagi, had wonne Calisyria, and the Provinces adjoining, for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recover his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were in the end of their dispute, as farre from concluding, as at the beginning. Ptolome demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolome would needs have Achæus comprehended in the League betweene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seek to joyn him in Confederacy with his owne Sovereigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrary to his expectation, he was informed, That Ptolome, with a very puissant Army, was coming up against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountered on the way by those Captaines of Ptolome, that had resisted him the yeare before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence nevertheless he drave them: and proceeding onward in his journey, wonne so many places, that he greatly increased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neare together: many Captaines of Ptolome forsook his pay, and fled over to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battell was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Asiatics were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gauls) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolome, with Artinoe his Sister and Wife, rode up and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the brave deeds of his Ancestors; as not having of their owne, whereby to value themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants, as also his, being of Asia, had they been fewer, would have beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the advantage of those beasts, He drave the Enemies before him, in that part of the battell wherein he fought himselfe. But Ptolome had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Groffe of his Enemies battell, and won the victory; whilst Antiochus was heedlesly following upon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field above seventy thousand foot, and fixe thousand horse; whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not four hundred horse; yet the fame of his overthrow took from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in feare, lest Ptolome and Achæus, setting upon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Egyptian, to treat of peace; which was readily granted: it being much against the nature of Ptolome to vex himselfe thus, with the tedious businesse of Warre. So Ptolome having staid three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subjects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achæus was not comprised in the league betweene these two Kings: or if hee had been

been included therein; yet would not the Egyptian have taken the paines, of making a second expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason: for besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged unto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, he had also good successe against Antalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was he, as Molo the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwife, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cousin-german to the King, as hath beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added majestie unto him, and had made his followers greatly to respect him, even as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolome of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battell at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: for the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrell betweene sonnes-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian, he was not onely slothfull, but hindred by a rebellion of his owne subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolome, contrary to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serve in the late expedition; beganne to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferior to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they less esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings mercenary Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in freight subjection. Thus brake out a warre betweene the King and his subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolome thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have beene spent, as he thought, much better in revelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, He had no sooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of war against Achæus. To this purpose he entred into League with Antalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebell, and finde him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within while he had pent up Achæus into the Citie of Sardis; where he held him about two yeeres besieged. The Citie was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found means how to enter the Towne. The Caffe it selfe was upon a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable; as also the Towne-wall adjoining to the Caffe, in that part which was called the Save, was in like manner situate upon steepe Rockes, and almost inaccessible; that hung over a deepe bottom, whereinto the dead carcases of Horses, and other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, used to be thrown. Now it was observed by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reason of their food which was there never wanting, used to flie up unto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch upon the walls, where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often, he reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left unguarded, as being thought unapproachable. Hereof he informed the king: who approved his judgment, and gave unto him the leading of such men, as he desired for the accomplishing of the enterprise. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceived: and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those rocks, and (whilest a generall assault was made) entred the towne in that part, which was at other times unguarded, then unthought upon. In the same place had the Persians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardis; when Crasus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning by the example of a losse many ages past: and therefore out of memorie. Achæus held still the Caffe: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries, and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it: having no other hope to prevaille, than by furnishing the inclosed. Besides the usuall tediousnesse of expectation, his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Ba-

Arrians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected kingdoms taken out of his Dominions, upon which they still inroached. But he thought it not safe, to let Achæus breake loose againe. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptolomie the Egyptian, and good friends unto Achæus; that made it their whole studie, how to deliver this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed that when he should appeare in the Countreys under Taurum, he would soone have an Armieat command, and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the ways in the Countrey, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rockes, whereon the Castle of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive at the hands of Ptolomie, as well as of Achæus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He undertook the businessse, and gave such likely reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote unto Achæus, by one Arianus, a trustie messenger, whom Bolis found meanes to convey into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Achæus held most assured. They also wrote unto him in privie Characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none save he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger, he was a trustie fellow, and one whom Achæus found, by examination, heartily affected unto their side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, That he should be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had wonne unto the businessse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him unknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; under whom he had the command of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Castle of Sardes. Nevertheless other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himself to some adventure. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro, it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speak with Achæus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, save onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countreimen,* some few excepted, have bene, and still are) false knaves. These two held a consultation together, that was, as Polybius observes it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the safety of him whose deliverance they undertooke, nor touching the discharge of their own faith; but only how to get most with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share betweene them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand: and then, That they would reveale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliver Achæus unto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present money, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a service, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus heeding this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad, than were the friends of Achæus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get up into the Castle, and convey Achæus thence: He first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gave him very private audience; and confirmed unto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberall promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull unto Ptolomie, whom he had long served, he accompanied Arianus up into the Castle. At his coming thither, hee was lovingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the businessse in hand. But he discoursed so well, and with such gravity; that there appeared no reason of distrusting either his faith or judgement. Hee was an old Souldier, had long bene a Captaine under Ptolomie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businessse; but was invited by honourable and faithfull men. Hee had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countreiman of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundry times given safe passage and repassage unto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an adventure stirred up some diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wisely, and sayd, That he would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: that hee meant to fend away with Bolis three or foure of his friends; from whom when hee received better advertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprize, then would he issue forth himselfe. Hereby he took order, not to commit himself wholly unto the faith of a man unknowne. But as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he playd the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to say, That he had to doe with one, whose knavery could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had layd their plots thus, That if Achæus came forth alone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it off; and Bolis following behind, should have an eye upon Achæus to prevent him, not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe; to the end that being taken alive, he might be to Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way served, and Bolis in the Rere. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his Wife Laodice; and comforting her with hopes well as he could, appointed foure of his special friends to beare him companie. They were all disguised: and one of them alone tooke upon him to have knowledge of the Greek tongues; speaking and answering as need should require for all, as if the rest had bene Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily devising upon his businessse, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to surmise anything to the mischief of another, yet could he not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himselfe were there. The way was very unesie, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to stay in divers places, and helpe one another up or downe. But upon every occasion they were all of them very officious towards Achæus; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gave Bolis to understand, that he was the man: and so by their unseasonable duty, they undid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolis whitede, and presently clasped Achæus about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stirre. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus; who sat up watching in his Pavilion, expecting the event. The sight of Achæus, brought in bound unto him, did so astonish the king, that he was unable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes, assembling his friends together, he condemned Achæus to a cruel death: which argues, that he was not moved with pity towards this unhappy man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident unto great fortunes, that wrung from him these teares: as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischievous knaves against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Proverb, A un traydor dos alcajofes. The death of Achæus brought such astonishment upon those which held the castle, that after a while they gave up the place & themselves unto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

* Among these few I doe not except one, calling himself Eudæmon. John Andrew a Cretan, who in one of his late pamphlets, the Libels, wherein he traduced our King, Religion, and Countrey, with all the good and worthy men of whom he could learn the names, haubly insinuating, my name twice, belied me; in calling me a Parian, and one that have been dangerous to my Sovereign. It is an honour to be ill spoken of by so diligent a supporter of Treasons, and Architect of Lies in regard whereof I may not denie him the commendation of Cretical cunning no lesse voluminous, than he in multiplicity of names, beyond any the Cretians in elder times, that were always Lyars, evil beasts, and so called bellies. a 2 Pol. lib. 1. 8.

Some yeeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subject unto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard: shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus; under whose posterity they continued until the Reigne of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustfull insolencie of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to be slain by the Gauls; did stirre up Artabanes, a Noble man of the Countrey, to seek revenge of injuries done, and animate them to rebell. So he lue the Kings Lieutenant; made himselfe King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in battell, whom hee royally entertained and dismissed. Hereby hee wonne reputation as a lawfull King: and by good government of his Countrey, procured unto himselfe such love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his successors; like as that of the Ptolomies in Egypt, and that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Babrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging unto the Seleucide beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an army, that they durst not meet him in plaine field; but kept themselves in woods, or places of strength, and defended the Streights and passages of mountains. The resistances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well formed, as he needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Streights between their mountains; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compass about, might either get above the enemies heads; or come behinde, and charge them on the backe. Thus did hee often employ against them his light armature: wherewith he caused them to dislodge, and give way unto his Phalanx; upon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground. Antiochus, the second of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though he was confident in the fidelity of his owne subjects; yet feared to encounter with so mighty an Invader. His hope was, that the bad wayes and De-farts would have caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to give over the journey, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out: Hee caused the Wells and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his Enemy must passe, to bee dammed up and spoyled. By which means, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not prevale, He withdrew himselfe out of the way; suffering the Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrey: wherein without some victory obtained, hee could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arfaces was nothing strongly provided for the War. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania where he wanne Tambrace, the chiefe City of that Province. This indignity, and many other losses, caused Arfaces at length, when he had gathered an Army that seemed strong enough, to adventure a battell. The issue thereof was such as gave to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficulty. Wherefore Arfaces craved peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subject.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but having gotten the Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it himselfe. With Euthydemus hee fought a battell by the River Arus, where he had the victory. But the victory was not so greatly to his honour, as was the testimony which he gave of his owne private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more courageously, than did any one man in all his Army. His horse was slaine under him; and he himselfe received a wound in his mouth, whereby he lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himselfe back unto the furthestmost parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protrasted the War, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was unjustly usurped from him: Euthydemus answering, That he had won it from the children of the Usurpers: and further, That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, save by a King of their owne; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they should joyne, it would bee greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behinde them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, upon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the son of Euthydemus, being a goodly gentleman, and employed by his father, as Ambassador in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little available unto a good conclusion: for Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to give him in marriage, one of his owne daughters; and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retain the Kingdome, causing him nevertheless to deliver up all his Elephants; as also to bind himselfe by oath, to such Covenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leaving the Bactrian in quiet, made a journey over Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagases, King of the Indians, the society that had been between their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject unto the Macedonians for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his Warre against Antigonus, raised part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Westward, and was over-buried in a great civil Warre: then did one Sandroctatus, an Indian, stirre up his Countrey-men to rebellion; making himselfe their Captaine, and taking upon him, as protector of their liberty. This Office and Title he soone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Majestie of a King. Finally he got unto himselfe (having an Army of fixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had bin Alexanders. In this estate he had well confirmed himselfe; Selencus Nicator could find leisure to call him to account: Neither did he faint, or humble himself at the coming of Selencus: but met him in the field, as ready to defend his owne; so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented to make both peace and affinity with him, taking only a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes, was continued by some Offices of love between their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian king, to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promised, to have some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receive. Thus parted these two great kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generatiōs, any business worthy of remembrance with the western Countries. The posteritie of Sandroctatus is thought to have retained that kingdome unto the dayes of Augustus Cesar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with presents, and an Epistle written in Greek, wherein, among other things, He said, That he had command over fixe hundred kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome, in divers Ages, even unto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophagases carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiving Presents; and after marching home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates, not only in the higher Asia, but on the hither side of Taurus, humbled themselves unto him, & called him The Great: saw an end of his own greatness within few yeeres ensuing, by presuming to stand upon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same indeed, that his was only in seeming.

§. III.

The lewd reign of Ptolomie Philopater in Egypt: with the tragick end of his favorites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolomie Epiphanes, the son of Philopater. His irresolution in preparing for divers wars at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. He seeks to hold amitie with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him; intending nevertheless to have war with him. His doings against the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrell to him.

His expedition being finished, Antiochus had leisure to repose himselfe a while; and studie which way to convert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeeres Ptolomie Philopater died: leaving his son Ptolomie Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdome; unlikely by him to be well defended against a neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Ptolomie turned Philopater, that is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that surname given him in meere derision; as having made away both his Father and Mother. His young yeeres being newly past, his childhood when he began to reigne, may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beastliness of all his following life, makes him not unlike to have done any mischief, whereof hee could be accused. Having won the battell at Raphiah, He gave himselfe over to sensuality; and was wholly governed by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. Acher infatigation Hee murdered his owne wife and sister; which had adventured her selfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him undertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenants of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices whatsoever, were wholly referred unto the disposition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and Oenaphe a filthy Bawd that was mother unto them both. So these three governed the Realme at their pleasure, to the great griefe of all the Countrey, till Philopater died: who having reigned seventeen yeeres, left none other sonner than Ptolomie Epiphanes a child of five yeeres old, begotten on Arfinoe that was his sister and wife. After the Kings death, Agathocles began to take upon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Governor of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolomie the first, and fadours; partly unto their whole city, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Ancestors and them; and willed them not to be afraid, lest his coming should tend unto any hurt, either of them, or of their confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly given to his Embassadors.

The Rhodiens appeared to have been a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed between his Embassadors and the Senate, moved them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephala. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still, unless the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolomy their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had ever been greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolomies. They therefore, in this time of necessity, gave what aide they could unto all the subjects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, betweene Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters upon him in marriage: He excused himself, and would not have her. Attalus and Phileteerum, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make war upon Antiochus; and therein finally prevail. Wherefore he said, That by abstaining from this affinitie, it should be in his power to joyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as he must be partaker in his overthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an over-mighty neighbour, if he happened to win the victory.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where he took such order as he thought convenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampascus to obedience; that had usurped their liberty, and obstinately strove to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he sailed unto the Hellepont: where having won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed over into Europe side; and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went he to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten & destroyed, when Philip withdrew his garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman war. The Ælians objected as a crime unto Philip, in the conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting thereinto a garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, that his garrison did not oppress the town, but save it from the Barbarians: who tooke and sackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good & substantiall, though it were not acceptable as such; might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his coming thither. For the town was utterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into slavery. Wherefore the King tooke order to have it re-edified: as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Country thereabout. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants, and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequentie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from coming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: he tooke a journey in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Army; leaving the other halfe to repair the City. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the convenient situation, & former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding unto his owne honour, to recover and establish the dominion in those parts which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearly pay: and as after that victory against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconquest of the same Countrey, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their warre with Philip: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight unto the King Antiochus. The Ælians murmur against the Romans in Greece. The warre of the Romans and Acheans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

10 FOR the Romans, though they were unable to smother their desire of warre with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the tumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprize of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their warre with Philip, could obtaine of them none other helpe against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him; because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards passe between them any other offices, than very friendly Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Invasion from the Kingdom of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie between them. This was whilest as yet they were busied with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients unto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed into termes of worse, but more plaine meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsaillors sent from Rome, required (as hath bin shewed before) with a commination of war, this Kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long-proffered amitie, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsaillors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable unto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progresse through divers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion served, use diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome unmindefull of the businesse: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Assaillants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Corneli was sent from Rome, of purpose to deale with the King about those controversies, that were betweene him and Ptolomy. What other private instructions Cornelius had; we may conjecture by the manning of this his Embassage. For coming to Selymbria: and there understanding that P. Villius and L. Torentius, having bin sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He hastened thither; whither also came P. Lemulus (another of the ten Counsaillors) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesimachus and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound unto their Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene him and these Romans, was in appearance full of love. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Corneli, in two or three words, briefly delivered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliver backe unto Ptolomy those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto hee added, and that very earnestly, That he must also give up the Townes of late belonging unto Philip; and by him newly enjoyed. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans, as to let Antiochus enjoy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured so much, and he done nothing? Further he warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally he demanded of him, upon what reason he was come over with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his journey there was none probable, than a purpose to make warre upon the Romans? To this the King made answer, That hee wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking upon upon the matters of Asia: wherewith hee prayed them to let him alone; even as hee, without such curiosity, suffered them to doe in Italy what they thought good. As for his coming over into Europe: they saw well enough what business had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recovery of Townes to him belonging in Thrace, & Chersonesus. Now concerning his title unto that countrey, He derived it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controversie betwene him and the other Kings, had beene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had beene seized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countreys, were hindred by multiplicitie of business, from looking unto all that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in fear of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this citie upon one of his sons, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free cities, or against the King of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding unto himselfe, and to joyne ere long with Ptolomy, not onely in friendship, but in a bond of neere affinity. Cornelius having heard this, and being perhaps unable to refute it; would needs heare further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampsacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampsacus being called in, began a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace, forasmuch as hee had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betwene him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few daies, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the warre by them intended: nor yet having purpose to depart well satisfied; & thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boistrous Gallo-Greeks, pretend onely the goodness of their swords; nor yet over-moderately, to retaine among the Greeks an opinion of their justice, forbore the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came news, without any certaine author, that Ptolomy was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdom, and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and set the Countrey in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassadour, both to Antiochus and to Ptolomy: which gave him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both he, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leave to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Army, and left him to oversee the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces he tooke along with him, and sailed unto Ephesus. Thence he sent Embassadors to T. Quinctius; whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of peace, after such sort as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage, he was perfectly informed that Ptolomy was alive. This made him beare another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grievous shipwracke, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to have safely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintred: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lysimachia, (at least: wife not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had beene sent unto the Macedonian, gave him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted unto him by the Romans, but to desire society with them, whereby they should be bound to have the same friends and enemies. And this he advised him to doe quickly, before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to have awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weak excuses. In like manner some of the Greeks were solicited; and particularly the Aeolians, That

That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the people of Rome. It was needlesse to say plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answer made by the Aeolians, declares them to have well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the victory, as they had beene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cried out, that they had beene wronged, and defrauded of what was promised unto them: upbraiding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not onely for their victory over Philip, but even for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and utter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriving at Carthage, gave matter unto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to picke a thank of the Roman Senate, and to chase out of their citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Civill administration; and given them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having subject unto them, the lives, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they use this their power with moderation; but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should have them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was sure to be soone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the citie, Hannibal was chosen Praetor. By vertue of which Office, though he was superiour unto them during that yeere: yet had it not bene their manner to beare much regard unto such an annuall Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must be accountable to them, if ought were laid unto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Quaestors, or Officers of the Treasure, to come and speake with him: the proud Quaestor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the adverse Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be chosen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the spirit of future Greatnesse. But hee had not to doe with such a tame Praetor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Purfivant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique assembly of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the undutifull stubbornnesse of this Quaestor had bene; but how unsufferable the insolencie of all the Judges at the present was: whose unbridled power made them to regard neither Laws nor Magistrates. To this Oration when hee perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable; Hee forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Judges should be chosen from yeere to yeere, and no one man be continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had bene passed, before hee passed over Iberus: it would not perhaps have bene in the power of Hanno, to have brought him unto necessity of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to levie by Taxation laid upon the whole Commonaltie, as wanting money in their publique Treasure, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needfull charges. Hannibal considering this, beganne to examine the publique Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasure, by wayes and meanes whatsoever; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So hee found, That the ordinary charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasure: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne use, were thereby faine to load the people with needlesse burdens. Hereof he made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knavery: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessity of making such poore shifts, as formerly they had used, when they knew not the value of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace untill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely; as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods, and ill-employed authority, both at once, even when they thought themselves to have been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the City by injustice, and robbing the Treasurie, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these Enemies to the Barchines might well crye out, That having done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of Warre. But having none other matter to alledge, than their owne inventions: they said, That Hannibal was like unto a wilde beast, which would never be tamed: That secret messages past betwene him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complaine of idlenessse, as if it were harmefull to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not unto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, every one to the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is said to have admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppresse, by suborning or countenancing false witness against him; the man, against whom in warre they had not of long time prevailed, nor used their Victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal, and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadors they sent over to Carthage, C. Servilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius. These Marcellus: whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These having past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their coming; and being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gave out, That they were sent to end some controversies, between the Carthaginians and Masaniissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espiall upon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was never unprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Having openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne when it began to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-side. There had he a Ship furnished with all things needfull; as having long expected the necessitie of some such journey. So hee bade Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrey, more than his owne. Passing over to the Ile of Cercina; hee found there in the Haven some Merchants shippes of Carthage. They saluted him respectively: and the chiefe among them began to enquire, whither he was bound. Hee said, Hee went Embassador to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Iland to make a sacrifice; whereto he invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hot weather: and therefore he would needes hold his Feast upon the shore; where, because there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their failles and yards to be used in stead of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleepe: and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassador: neither could they, without some losse of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina; being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of so great a person was diversely confuted. Some ghesseid aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where he had beene seene: and then the Roman Embassadors, having none other errand thither, accused him (with an evill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they onely discovered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; missing the while their purpose, and causing men to understand, that hee fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal coming to Tyre, the Mother-City of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity betwene their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went he to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his son in Daphne: who friendly welcomed med him, and sent him unto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly rejoyced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorrie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discoverie of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrie. For it would not prove alike easie unto this great Commander, to make stout Souldiers of base Asiaticques; as it had bin by his training and discipline; to make very servicable and skillfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations; that were hardie, though unexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the basenesse of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making unprofitable the vertue of Hannibal, now a desolate and banished man, than had bin the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further served to hearten Antiochus, and make him lesse carefull to avoid the war; then should it further serve, to justifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, having newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Armes; unlesse by mere violence he were thereto enforced. Onely the Etolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innovation, and therefore practising with his Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appease them; they had of late beene answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsaillours, That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should aske. But this promise was too large, and unadvised. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who favoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of war with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Countrie. For the Etolians were wont to upbraid therof the Greeks with the vain libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliverers had laid heavier fetters upon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter & fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, that it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chaine, & tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no delay, in accomplishment of that which was laid upon him: all the Townes of Greece were at liberty, and the whole Countrie at peace, both with the Romans, and within it selfe. As for Antiochus; He made it his daily suit, That the Peace between him and Rome, such as it was, might be confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Nevertheless, T. Quintius would needes feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize upon Greece, as soone as he and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained still in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Invasion like to be made by Antiochus. Sureable unto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the ten Embassadors, that had beene sent over to assist him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they said, would questionlesse fall upon Greece: wherein he should finde not only the Etolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaemon, ready to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to do somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilst Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intente to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the City, among the Vulgar; but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprise in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African, desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his Hannibal.

Hannibal. For the present, the business with Nabis was referred unto Titus; to deale with him as he thought good. This would be a faire colour of his longer tarrance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also he knew that many of the Greekes would not be sorry; though for his owne part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeeres before this, as is already shewed, whilest he had warre with Philip: and had further bene contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Achaens; neither since that time had he done any thing, whereby he should draw upon himselfe this Warre. He was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achaens; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the war with Philip, not only the Greeks, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearsed) that should stirre them up, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than only the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilest the noble City of Argos was left in subjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged unto them, the Greekes, duly to consider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argos a matter worthy to be undertaken; or whether to otherwile to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greeks themselves. The Athenian Embassadour made answer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as he could devise. He gave thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their virtues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein unrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended unto the Greeks. To this he added, That great pittie it was to heare, such notable vertue & high deserts ill spoken of by some: which took upon them, out of their owne imagination, to foretell what harme these their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankfulness rather would have required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleasures already received. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Etolians. Wherefore Alexander the Etolian rose up, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glory, in those times when their City had bene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the liberty generall: from which honour they were now so farre fallen; that they became Parasites unto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would leade all the rest into servitude. Then spake hee against the Achaens, Clients that had bene a long time unto the Macedonian; and Souldiers of Philip, untill they ranne away from his adversity. These, he said, had gotten Corinth, and must now have warre be made for their sakes, to the end that they might all bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Etolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes bene friends unto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus containe himselfe, but objected unto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrison in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Atroposinib; having bene always wont to professe, That Greece could never be at liberty, whilest those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than business wherewith to finde themselves occupied; that so they might have some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Countrey: But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Etolians themselves did promise, & would undertake, That they would either cause him to yeeld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece; that was now at unity. These words had bene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common liberty wrought so much with these Etolians; as did their owne ravenous desire of oppressing others, and getting unto themselves, that worke would use it, the whole Dominion in Greece; which Philip had had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had bene covenanted, That the Romans should enjoy the spoile of all, but leave the Townes and Lands in possession of the Etolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole assembly, especially the Achaens, crye out upon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Etolian theeves be enforced to keepe home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus, who saw, that by discountenancing the Etolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard upon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. He cast them off with a sleight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsaillours which had bene sent unto him from Rome, to be his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude upon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedaemonian warre; it was very soone ended. For Titus used the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should have had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Navie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the service: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get favour of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking revenge upon Nabis, that had done him injurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achaens, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Etolians: rather to hold good fashion, and found their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achaens now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Etolians from that degree of favour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedaemonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives, more bold than wife, began a conspiracie against the Lacedaemonians that held their Town; meaning to open their gates unto the Romans. But ere Titus drew neere, they were all detected and flaine: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Army to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no fir within the Walls: the execution done upon the first movers, having terrefied all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assaile Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedaemon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom whereof since the Warre was made, pittie it were, that the calamities of the warre should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readinesse an Army of fiftene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Invaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his owne Countrey; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumifed slaves, malefactors and base peasants, unto whom his Tyranny was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an assembly: and compassing them round in with his Army, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemie. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and worke dangerous treason: it seemed unto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to arrest before-hand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keepe them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not only the City and his own person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might have incurred. Hereupon he cytes and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom he leades away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else doe than terrefie the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortal crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it selfe unto some some poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemy. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and flaine. Having thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely, all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. He welcommed them with a sallee: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Tinus abode not many dayes before Sparta: but over-ran the Countrey, hoping belike to provoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time, with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid siege unto Gysieum, the onely or principall Town that Nabis had. Likely they were to have taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Governours within the Towne equall in authority: whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, slue the Traitor; after whose death, he himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quinius with part of his Armie came thither to Gysieum: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the uttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to give up the place; yet upon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother unto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Governement, with a thousand Souldiers Mercenaries, and two thousand Argives: it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieve Gysieum: which he thought would have held longer out. But when he heard that it was lost, then began they to thinke upon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassadour to Tinus: requesting onely that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parle the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe: proving, that he suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments; whereof the summe was, That whatsoever they now did, or could object unto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alledged, they ought to make warre upon him; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoever, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from entering into that League with him; which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quinius was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with Tyranny; & gave instance, as easily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points so far as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Invasion should be alledged. Wherefore he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to joyne with Philip; when he was their enemy; not onely in League, but also in affinity: and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Pyracie, since in the Articles by Tinus propounded unto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom he had long held warre: it may seeme to have bene objected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very frivolous. As for Messene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to have bene mentioned. All this it seems that Aristanus, the Prator of the Achaens, very well perceived: who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne justice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbear to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had never done them wrong; framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his owne estate; & to settle his fortunes, whilest he might do it without hazard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbouring cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and lived in great security, honour, and happinesse, as private men. Thus they discoursed untill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliver unto him in writing their other demands, that he might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must be, for maintenance of an Army to lie in League all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, upon such Conditions as Tinus should thinke meet. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Tinus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grievous. He would not suffer the Lacedemonian to have ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor warre, either in that Iland or else-where; nor to build any Towne or Castle upon his owne Lands; nor to keepe any other shipping, than two small Barkes; besides many other troublesome injunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in silver to be paid out of hand, and fifty talents yearly, for eight yeeres next ensuing. For observance of these Covenants he demanded five hostages, such as he himselfe should name; and one of them to be the Tyrants owne sonne. If it had bene the meaning of Tinus, to withdraw the warre from Nabis, because it was not grounded upon justice: then had it bene enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himselfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliver up. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound unto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyranny: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, have bin prosecuted unto the very utmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable unto them, to enrich themselves by the spoile of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Achaens, who judged it ever after a great blemish to the noble acts of Tinus: so did it minister unto the Etolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which tooke upon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masterly Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged unto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedemon, once the most famous Citie among all the Greeks, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had usurped it but yesterday: and he therein rooted by their authority, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himselfe unmercifully dealt withall, by the selfe-same Romans, whose amity he had preferred in time of a doubtful warre, before the love and affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the City of Argos into his hands. But fallily had he dealt with the Macedonian: and fallily was he dealt with by those, to whom he did beake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him; save onely that for the banished Lacedemonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; having among them Agessipolis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a young child was driven out by Lycurgus the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them restored unto their Citie and Estates; but onely leave required for as many of their wives, as would be so contented, to live abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to give consent unto these demands: and sustained an assault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would soone bee wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yeelding unto all that had been propounded, He delivered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans farre more wicked than himselfe; and was ready upon the first advantage, to doe them all the mischief that he could.

The Argives had heard newes that Lacedemon was even at point of being taken. This erected them, and gave them heart to thinke upon their owne good. So they adventured to set upon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remove of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed imo to their liberty no more, than that all of them joyntly should set their hands to the getting of it; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quinius to Argos, where he was joyfully welcomed: He was deservedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had layed hold without staying for him: and that he might the better entitle himselfe thereto, he caused the liberty of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Nemean games; as ratifying it by his authority. The Citie was annexed againe to the Councill of Achaia; whereby the Achaens were not more strengthened, than the Argives themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little business or none wherewith to set on worke his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed unto quiet, Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not have his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The un-sincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Aetolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making War. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Aetolians, & of thoroughly perswading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure unto themselves the patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrey was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation unto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them over againe. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere distance appearing; he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted unto them all that had passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsell, touching the moderate use of their liberty, & the care which they ought to have of living peaceably, and without faction. Lastly he gave up Acrocorinthus to the Acheans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soone he did) at Chalcis and Demetrius; that so it might be knowne, what lyers the Aetolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With joyfull acclamations did the Greekes testifie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransom and enlarge all Romans, that had been sold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leaving the Countrey before his departure was urged, left therein behinde him the memory of his vertue and benefits, untainted by jealousy and suspicion of any evil meaning. At his coming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had untill that day beheld. Three dayes together the shew of his pomp continued: as being set out with the spoiles of a Countrey, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Silver: some in the rude Masse unwrought, some in divers sorts of Coin; and some in Vessels of sundry kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entered the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and foureteen Crownes of Gold, bestowed upon him by divers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the son of Nabû, were principall. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking to the shew) the Roman Captives; by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after this Triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very favourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred over to T. Quintius, and the ten that had bin his Counsaillors; because their business was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereto the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said unto Titus and his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexity of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either between the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that having warred together, were upon equal termes of advantage; or between those that had lived alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Unto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yield; and patiently endure the imposition of some Covenants, that else might seeme unreasonable. Where Warre had bene made, and no advantage gotten: there was it usuall to demand and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could could agree. But betweene those which had never fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to be proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neither carry it selfe as superiour to the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the league and friendship that had bene so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insit on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to prescribe unto the King, what Cities of Asia he should set at liberty; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting or not putting his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintius answered, that since they went so distinctly to worke, He would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded unto them two Conditions, and gave them their choice whether to accept: Either that it should be lawfull for the Romans to take part in Asia with any that would seek their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would have them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoever he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately won in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampsacus, or any other Asiatiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make Warre with a King that fought their love, and had never done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliver up unto them the Citie of Lyfimachia, whereon of late he had bene at so much cost; in building it up even from the foundation, and repeopleing it with Inhabitants, that had all bene dispersed, or captiveto the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alleged: saying, That Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke upon them as if their cause were far the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose to set at liberty those Towns, which the King would oppress and hold in subjection: especially since those Townes were of Greekish bloud and language; and fell, in that regard, under the patronage which Rome had afforded unto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soon have left Antiochus King of not many subjects on the higher side of Euphrates. Neither did they forebear to say, That unless he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied upon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be understood) with such as were his subjects. Wherefore they urged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make; little wanted of giving presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, & were contented once againe to send over P. Villius, & others that had bin already with the king at Lyfimachia; by whom they might receive a final answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two years, or thereabouts, to prepare for War; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him live in peace.

§. V.

Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Masinissa to the Carthaginians, that were to the Romans for justice in vaine.

THE Insubrians, Bojians, and other of the Cisalpine Gauls, together with the Ligurians, made often and (in a manner) continuall Warre upon the Romans in Italy, even from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, untill such time as they themselves were utterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the very height of their Empire. These Nations, having served under Mago for vvages, and afterwards having gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader unto them all, as hath bene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldom afterwards either the Gauls or Ligurians did stir alone; but that their Companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lumbardie; it hath been long since rehearsed between the first and second Punic Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Country, by means of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would have been more difficult or tedious unto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed unto this War, had not been distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of body; well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight againe. Their Country was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of straight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither be taken nor besieged. They were also very poor; and had little or nothing that might give contentment unto a victorious Army that should spoyle their Land. In these respects, they served excellently well to traine up the Roman Souldiers to hardnesse and military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of Warre) to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their love unto the Gauls, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territory of their borderers, that were subject unto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begun, seemes to have been grounded upon the Condition of all Salvages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Judgement: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from using their advantage, or taking revenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This quality is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betwene them and any of their neighbours, doe use commonly this answer, It hath still bene the custome for us and them, to fight one against the other.

Divvers overthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gave unto the Romans; but many more, and greater, they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable so to do. The best was, that as their Country was a good place of exercise unto the Romans, so out of their own Country they did little harme: not sending any great Armies far from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make Warre, save on their owne ground.

The Countrey of Spain, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subject unto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers unto an Ox-hide; and the Romans found in it the property of that Ox-hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed unto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For treading upon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spain. Seldome did it happen that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not up in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardy Nation, and easily stirred up to armes; but had not much knowledge in the art of War, nor any good Captaines. They vntied also (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being divided into many small Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldom or never provided in generall for the common good of their Country; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to look unto their owne Territory. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had united themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often overthrowes: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had bene accustomed, to make evacuation of this Cholericke Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their Warres abroad, those that were most likely to be unquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and used them in another: finding means to pay them all, out of the profits which they raised upon the whole Countrey; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwise, the Romans, using the service of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to have much businesse with them. Spain was too far distant, and withall too great for them to send over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they took in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwayes maintain such Armies in the Countrey, as might serve to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Captains, as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did; and thereby held the Countrey; though seldom in peace.

Very soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised Warre in Spain against the Romans, even upon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Warres following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards, should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to help themselves against those that were strangers, yet usurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behinde him in that Countrey, being well acquainted with the manner of Warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with subjection, brought peace upon the Countrey; which lasted five yeares. This Victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the Warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the Warre; which after five yeares brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battell with the Roman Proconsull, whom they slew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to send thither two Prætors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consull the year following, and sent into that Province; found at his comming little lesse to doe, than the reconquering of all Spain. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the paines that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great Victory upon the chiefe of them; they rose against him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him unto much new trouble. Whilst he was about to make a journey against those that were as yet unsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were even ready to rebell. Hee therefore disarmed them: which they tooke so heavily, that many of them slew themselves for very griefe. Hearing of this, and well understanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called unto him the principall among them: and commending unto them peace and quietnesse, which they never had disturbed but unto their owne great losse, He prayed them to devise what course might be taken, for holding them assured unto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would give counsell in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kinde of Subject; He gave expresse charge, That upon a day appointed they should throw downe the walls of all their Townes. Afterwards hee carried the Warre about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an army of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countreymen: excusing the indignity, such as it seemed, with a jest. That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, He could pay them with the enemies money. Finally, He brought the Warre to go good end, that in long time after, though Spain were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publike Revenues in that Province, by causing some Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before laine unregarded.

Hein he did benefit the Common-wealth by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed the occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other usefull qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seeme requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skilfull in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in many businesse either private or publike. Many books he wrote: whereof the principall were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry. In matter of husbandry he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his Houfe. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him unto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sincerity of life, abstinence from bribes, and fawning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein hee had merited singular commendations, if the vehemence of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, He was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that he could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he were never out of his Element. He loved businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that even unto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himselfe or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore and six yeares, he pleaded in his owne defence: and foure yeares after, he accused Sergius Galba unto the people. So began the Nobility of Cato his family; which ended in his great grand-child M. Cato the Utican: one that being of like vertue and fervencie, had all his good purposes dashed, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobility and Greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrey, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrey seldom free from insurrection; in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two every yeare were sent over Commanders into Spain (that was divided into Governments) did rarely faile of such worke, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One flew thirteen thousand Spaniards in a battell: another tooke fifty Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to sue for peace. Thus every one of them, or most of them, did some laudable service; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I have already pointed; and therefore think it enough to say, That the businesse in Spain required not the employment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, untill the Numantian Warre broke out, which was very long after.

In all other Countreies to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine Houfe promised all felicity which Rome could grant, unto themselves and their obedient City: Masaniissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the lesser Syrtyis: wherein, among other Cities, was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrey the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime unto the whole. Hee had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redresse, than by sending to Rome 40 their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to allege, if the Judges had bene impartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Countrey: Masaniissa himselfe, now very lately pursuing a Rebelle that fled out of his Kingdome, desired leave of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise been questionable) that the Countrey was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniissa had wherewith to justify his proceedings, especially unto the Roman Senate. He gave the Fathers to understand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately bene sent unto them from Hannibal, one that should perfwade them to take part with Antiochus. 50 This man they had examined upon some suspicion of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby afforded him means to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe.

As for the Countrey of Emporia: it had alwaies, he said, bene theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime unto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if the truth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title unto any more ground, than that that whereon their City stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africk, that had gotten leave there to build upon so much ground, as they could encompass with an Oxe-hide cut into small thongs. Whatsoever they held without such a compasse, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This considered, Masaniissa requested of the Senate, That they would not adjudge unto such usurpers, the Countrey sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtfull, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore, because they would do nothing rashly; they sent over three Embassadors, of whom P. Scipio the African 10 was one and the chiefe, to decide the controversie: yet secretly giving them instructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Masaniissa with a strong Army should quickly prevaike against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not only from furring in favour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little unto their snall destruction: that came upon them, when the Romans had leisure to expresse the utmost of their hatred.

§. VI.

The *Ætoli*ans labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis to War upon the Romans, by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis besiegeth Gyrtbeum, and mastereth some part of Achaia. The exact skill of Philopœmen in advantage of ground: whereby hee utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace by the Romans, joyne with the *Ætoli*ans. The *Ætoli*ans surprize Demetrias; and by killing Nabis, their Confederates, seize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his persuasions annex themselves to the Achaïans.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the *Ætoli*ans to thinke, that they who had promised unto themselves the whole spoile of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greeks; were not only disappointed of their covetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most unregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much unto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might well have sufficed them, if their desires had not been immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due: as they were vexed with the denial of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had unfufferable wrong. Wherefore they devised, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what means they best might right themselves; and give the Romans a forrowfull knowledge of the difference between their enmity and friendship. To this purpose they soon agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not onely perfwade Antiochus to make War upon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmonia, to joyne all together in a new Confederacy: whose joynt forces could not in all likelihood, but far surmount those of the Romans, Achaïans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the *Ætoli*ans took in hand; and well 50 befitting them, for they were great darters. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with perfwasions, as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to try first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any War; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seeke any good pretence, began immediately to lay siege unto Gyrtbeum, that had been lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achaïans, to whose care chiefly Timæ at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his duty: neither would they have staid long from repressing his violence by open War: had not some of them thought it wisdome to aske Counsell of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilst thus they spent the time in sending Embassadors, and were advised by Quintius to let all alone, and to wait for the coming of the Roman forces, that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to give them iust cause of complaint, by waisting their owne Territory.

Philopamen was then Pretor of the Achaens, who had long bin absent in Crete; making War there for his minds sake and recreation. Unto him the Achaens referred themselves, giving him leave to order the War at his pleasure; either staying till the Romans came, or doing otherwise, as he should thinke best. He made all haste to relieve Gysieum by Sea; fearing lest the Towne, and the Achaen Garrison within it, should be lost, if he used any delay. But Philopamen was so bad a Sea-man, that hee knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrirème Gally his Admirall, that had fourescore yeares agoe bene counted a gallant Vessell, in the Navie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedamonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigantine, that fought better with her wings, than with her talons. For his Admirall Gally was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leaks, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and saved themselves with what speed they could. But Philopamen was not herewith daunted. If he had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Army from the siege of Gysieum, to stop the Achaens if they should invade his Countrey. But upon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came unexpected; fired their Camp, and put all, save a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched hee with all his Army towards Lacedamon: within ten miles whereof he was when the Tyrant met him, that had already taken Gysieum. It was not expected that Nabis would have bene ready for them so soon. Or if he should come from Gysieum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that he must overtake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some five miles; having their Horle, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Army; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the custome of Philopamen, when he walked or travelled abroad with his friends, to marke the situation of the Countrey about him; and to discourse what might befall an Army marching the same way. He would suppose, That having with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and fortified in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were upon that ground encountered by a greater Army, or better prepared to fight. Then would he put the question, Whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand: what piece of ground it were meet for him to seize upon; and in what manner he might best do it: in what sort he should order his men: whether bestow his carriages, and under what Guard: in what sort encamp himselfe: and which way march the day following? By such continuall meditation, Hee was growne so perfect, that he did never meet with any difficultie, whence he could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and having drawne up his Rere, Hee encamped neere unto the place where he was within halfe a mile of the Enemy. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiers. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to vvaite at one Brook; whereto the Achaens lay the neerer. This vvaiteing there was like to minifter the first occasion of skirmish. Philopamen understood this; and laid an ambush in place convenient; wherein after the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, he caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitive, and tell him, that the Achaens had a purpose to get between him and Lacedamon; whereby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recovery of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would have bene forced. Some

Some companies he made to stay behind, and shew themselves upon the Rampart, thereby to concale his departure. But Philopamen was not so to be beguiled. He easily won the Campe, and gave chase to Nabis: whose followers being overtaken, had no courage to turn about & make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into woods where they lay in covert all that day: Philopamen conceived a right, that their fear and necessity would teach them to creep homewards, and save themselves, when it grew dark. Wherefore in the Evening, when he had gathered together all those of his light-armature, which had followed the chase whilst it was day, he led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, and occupied the two most ordinary passages unto Lacedamon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiving in Philopamen Campe great store of lights; thought that all had bin at rest: and therefore adventured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty dayes together after this, did Philopamen waite the Countrey round about, whilst Nabis durst not issue forth of his town; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them, labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be solicited by the Epiians. Very faire countenance they also made unto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoever he thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore unto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that he should receive other favours at their hands; and regaine possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Antiochus in Greece, whilst their Embassadors that were with him in Asia; denied, or otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yeeld unto one of the Conditions; by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage betweene Ptolomie and his daughter; together with the death of young Antiochus the Kings sonne, which happened during the Treatie; and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King from giving audience in person to the Embassadors; caused them to returne home to Rome; as uncertain of their answer as at their setting forth. One thing that might have bene, and partly was, beneficiall unto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Livie rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there; they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for having thus fled unto Antiochus, upon a causelesse suspicion wherein he held the Romans; that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadors; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had lived, Hannibal judged the most worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrius the second: and the third he challenged unto himselfe. But Scipio, who thought his own title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten, asked yet further, What wouldst thou have said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished me? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I have given the first place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due unto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise, the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadors, made him suspected of Antiochus, who therefore did forbear a while to use his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King, and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; he easily recovered his former grace and credit. For hee told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when he was a little boy, That he never should be friend unto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine surmises: but to know thus much, That so long as he thought upon warre with Rome, so long would Hannibal doe him all good service: whereas contrariwise, if he intended to make peace, then should it behoove him to use the counsell of some other man.

The Ætolians, and their friends, were no lesse busie all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans, than were the Romans in mustering up their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vaunting much of their own forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victory against Philip, that finally they prevailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, unless he would buy it at too deare a rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian.

But

But in vaine. He understood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their owne forces to the uttermost: as knowing, that all the burden must lie upon Antiochus and themselves, without helpe from any; save onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus, that animated them to resolution, the Athenian Embassadors, whom Timm had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto; they were contented to approve the motion. Timm hearing this, thought the businesse worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans; it would be no small piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panecolium, for great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serve to appeale them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprize which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champagne-field, on which, to the mine of the Country, the Romans and the Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Making the Antiochus, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becoming the Sicklers. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and urge them to such violent courses; he willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doe, to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right unto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they desired: than thus to set the world in an uproare, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose helpe they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes unto them, to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired; either as their right, or else by way of favour. For with such termes had they bin eased once already: and were by the Senate rejected unto Timm: who, having it in his owne power, gave them no satisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were only losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be intreated to come over into Greece, as well to set the Country at liberty, as also to decide the controversies depending between the Romans and Ætoliens. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not understood the Kings minde before. Having made it, they forgot no point of bravery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and against the Romans. Timm desired of their Prator, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prator answered; That then he had other things to doe: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their Camp in Italy upon the river of Tibris. Gentler words would have done better, as the Ætoliens are like to understand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to work. The care of the warre they referred unto the more private Councell of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a general assembly. The Apoclei (so were the Privie Councell of Ætolia called) went as hody to worke as any of the youngest heads could have done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they took upon the sudden; entering some of them as friends, to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had been driven to flee thence; but was, by intercession of those that loved him, againe recalled. His Ætolian companions, that were not many, seized upon a Gate; whereas they let in a Troupe which they had left not far behind them: and so fell to murdering the chief of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostility, they gave a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliver the Town from the Romans; who more insolently domineered over it, than ever the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetoricke they prevailed no more, than they could doe by plain force.

force. For the Townes-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injurie. So this businesse was dashed. The attempt upon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Town; styling himselfe King: but more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had well-nere lost all, by means of the overthrow which Philopamen had lately given him; since he durst not stirre abroad; and daily expected the mischief, that on all sides threatened him. Wherefore he sent messengers, one after another, to the Ætoliens; requesting them, That as he had not beene slow to stirre in their behalf, but adventured himselfe upon the utmost of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased to send him what helpe they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath beene often said, That the ravenous Ætoliens were only true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship, otherwise, than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercenary forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to assure Lacedæmon unto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamennus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gave a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Demetrius the Prator brought into the Councell of the Apoclei; where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to thinke that they were sent to make warre with the Acheans, or to doe ought else, save onely what Alexamennus should command them; which were it never so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they understand, that unless they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamennus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would suffice to tread them downe. As for the Ætoliens, he said, that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could, before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had bin long pent up in the Citie; and traîne them without the wals: as if shortly he should employ them in work of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field; riding up and downe with this Alexamennus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamennus made it his fashion, to step aside alone to his Ætoliens, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned againe to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great work which he had in hand; he then went aside to his thirtie horsemen, and bade them remember the taske enjoyned them at their setting forth; telling them, that they were all in case of banished men, unless they would anon come up to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them: and Alexamennus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and strucke him downe. The thirtie Ætoliens never stood to deliberate upon the matter, but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently upon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ran unto the dead body: where, in stead of seeking revenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamennus with his Ætoliens hastied into the Citie, and seized upon the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not indure to see those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the town was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Capitaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall stocke, that had beene brought up with Nabis his children; whom they mounted upon a good Horse, and made him their Chiefe. So they fell upon the Ætoliens that were idly straggling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamennus with with not many of his Company, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopæmen came thither: who saving out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words unto them, as Alexandrus should have done after he had slaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and safety, to incorporate themselves with the Achaens. Thus by the enterprife, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians; and the small, but effectuall, travell of Philopæmen, the Achaens made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto bin governed either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, whereof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled over all Greece.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece ill attended. Sundry passages between him the Ætolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the cruell answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achaens. That is concerned the Greekes to have desired peace between the Romans and Antiochus, as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King, Of Aminander, and an idle vanity, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good counsell in vaine. Some Towns won in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis, where he marries a young wife, and revels away the rest of winter. Upon the coming of the Roman Consul all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keeps the Streights of Thermopylae. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece unto the Victors.

A Niuchus was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him; and to win them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was he desirous, with all speed convenient, to shew himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the country there was a very small number, which bore hearty affection unto the Romans: That Nabis was already up in arms: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chain, desiring nothing more, than to breake loose; and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were ready to conferre upon him the greatest, which they had unworthily bestowed upon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise, as added credit unto all the rest. Whilest therefore the king was thinking to send Hannibal into Africk, there to molest the Romans, and so give him the better leisure of using his own opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came over to him, and bad him lay all other care aside; for that his Country-men had already taken Demetrius, a Town of main importance, that should give him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatnesse of his vertue & fortune. This did serve to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal, Thoas was bold to tel the king, first, That it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serve to lay open unto him all places, without need of using violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprife there could not be chosen a more unfit man to be employed in the kings service, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the king should as greatly feeble the losse of a Fleet or Army, perishing under such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried under one of meaner qualitie: whereas neverthelesse if Hannibal prevailed, Hannibal alone should have all the honor, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should be alwayes nere unto the Kings person, to give advice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound unto the honour of him that had the soveraigne Command; even of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkened unto this admonition; being jealous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Majestie of his own fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the advancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought upon.

Presently

Presently after this, He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a frivolous pompe of ceremony, he went up from the Sea-side to Iulium: there to doe sacrifice to Minnerva of Troy. Thence passing over the Aegean Sea, He came to Demetrius, Eurylochus the Magnesian, the same whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrius; was now the chiefe man, and Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countreimen, in great frequentie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a signe of good lucke, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnesian found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Army some what like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships; of which, no more than fortie were serviceable for the Warres, with an Armie of tenthousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and fixe Elephants. The Ætolians no sooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament, and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their country. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Ætolians gave him as joyfull entertainment as they could devise. Being brought into their Councell, he made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he said, in true estimation, a signe of his good will: in that he itaid not to make all things ready, but hastened unto their aide, even whilest the season was unfit for navigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied unto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, travell, or danger, to follow the businesse which he had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their authority out of Greece; leaving the Country freeindeed, and the Ætolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great; so was it his meaning, that all provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not be any way burdensome unto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs intreat them, having thus hastily come over unto their aide, unprovided of many necessaries, that they would help him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he stood in need. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vaine motion was made by some, that the differences between the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yeeld unto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may observe, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus, in a businesse of dangerous importance, upon the promised assurance of a State that is merely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Councell: the Ætolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea, for hope of such gaine that might have deceived them, were like to have abandoned this King their friend, unto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there been, if this had so fallen out? He could have bemoaned himself to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he must have been contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thoas would therefore have pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present, though in the future it proved much worse, both for him, and for the Ætolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirty Commiffioners were appointed to be about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should begin the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meekest place to be first undertaken: whether if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure need to use much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thousand Foot, leaving the rest behind him at Demetrius. With these he hastened away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the Ætolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Ætolians began, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and usefull, they said, would never be obtained; untill by removing the necessity of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, every severall Estate had where to finde redresse of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well well able to counterpoise, yea to overweigh the Romans: who nevertheless desired them enely, so to joyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans or he should offer them wrong, they might keep it in their power, to seek redresse at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations; they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they wereto thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirme of all the Greeks; forasmuch as none of them paid any Tribute, was kept under by any Garrison, or lived otherwise than by their owne Laws, and without being tied unto conditions, which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deliver Cities that were already free. But since he, and the Ætolians, requested their friendship; they besought both him and the Ætolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soon after, he brought thither a greater power, which terrified them, and made them yield: before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Eubœa being thus gotten, all the rest of the Iland shortly yielded to Antiochus. Foure or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came over-late to have defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little town of Bœotia, lying over against the Iland; where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated unto Apollo, that had the privilege of an inviolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seen, whilst others were buffed as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Memppus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himselfe in many vain Treaties of peace, took advantage of their carelesnesse, and used them with all extremity of war. Very few of them escaped: fiftie were taken, and the rest slain. Hereat Quintus was grieved yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more just cause than before, to make war upon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece; 30 in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wiler for returned such answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reserved themselves untill he should come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, he must hold them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if he came, the Romans must pardon their just feare, in yielding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, joynd with him in true meaning, save the Eleans, that alwayes favoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Acheans. Little reason there was, that he should think to draw the Acheans to his partie. Nevertheless he assayed them, upon a vain hope, that the envie which Titus was said to beare unto Philopœmens verue, had bred a secret dislike between that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both he and the Ætolians sent Embassadors to the Councell at Ægium; 40 that spured not brave words, if the Acheans would have beene so taken. The Kings Embassadour told of great Armies and Fleets that were comming; reckoning up the Dabants, Medians, Elimeans, and Caducians; names that were not every day heard of, & therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydoniens, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; such indeed as could not be resisted. Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late warre made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would prove the like: the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the utmost parts of the East; requested no more 50 of the Acheans, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilst he took order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Ætolian Embassadour, and further added, that in the battell at Cynosephala, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both he and his Army had bin there destroyed, had they not bene protected by verue of the Ætolians, which carried the day: Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could have beene desired. He told the Acheans, That neither the Kings Embassadour, nor the Ætolian, did so greatly labour to perswade those unto whom they addressed addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselves the one unto the other. So as a man might well discern, what good correspondence in vanity it was, that had thus linked the King and the Ætolians together. For even such bragges as here they made before the Acheans, who knew them to be liars, had the Ætolians also made unto King Antiochus; proclaiming the victory over Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Countrey of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassadour told even now; of Dabants, and Aradians, and Elimeans, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bond-slaves, and good for little else. These divers 10 names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diversity of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no such vaunter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that variety, wherewith he wondered, was none other, as his Host then merrily told him; than so many pieces of one tame swine, drest after severall fashions, with variety of sauces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pompe: it were good to make judgement of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than tenne thousand men about him: for which little Army hee was 20 faime in a manner to begge victuals of the Ætolians; and take up money at usurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ranne up and downe the Countrey; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence back to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lyes: wherewith, since both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser men took heed by their example. To a favourable Auditory much persuasion is need- 30 less. The Acheans did not love so well the Ætolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest objects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed Warre against him, and against the Ætolians.

How the hatred betweene these two Nations grew inveterate; sufficiently appears in the story foregoing. Now have they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; 30 the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them unwisely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrey at rest: there was nothing more greatly to have beene desired, than that they might never finde occasion to returne with an Army thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to have sought, not how Smyrna and Lampfacus might recover their liberty (which had never been held a matter worth regarding, untill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, divided and kept asunder by their Countrey, as two Seas by an Isthmus, or neck of land, might be kept from overflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiaticques, who originally were 40 Greeks; than the generall applause, wherewith all the nation entertained this their loving offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of feare, that should move them to take armes even in their owne defence. But if all Greece would have made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising joyndly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, vvhenever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell beene at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Countrey, had been far from growing, as soon after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Acheans were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely and 50 generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gave doubtfull answers of hope unto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thesalians, were firm against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrell, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Bœotians vvolingly received him, as soone as he entered upon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by vvhom they had bin somewhat hardly used. Aminander the Albanian, besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himselfe to be defended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sons, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poore Court of Athamania: where having made his folly knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turns. They made him beleeve, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behooved him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of service done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzies in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his subjects: or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harm to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to do good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched unto Cynosephala, there to gather up the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie unburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to think on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended merely unto his desight. Wherefore he presently sent unto the Romans; and gave them to understand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them whereinsoever they should be pleased to use him.

The Ætolians, Magnetians, Eubeans, Boeotians, and Athamanians, having now all joyne with him; Antiochus tooke counsell of them about the prosecution of the Warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone until the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another; confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long been cast aside, as a vessel of no use; but was now required to deliver his opinion. Hee freely told the King, That what he should now utter, was even the same which he would have spoken, had his counsell at any time before been asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Boeotians, and other their good friends, which now so willingly took their parts: what were they else than so many poore Estates, that wanting force of their owne, did adjoyne themselves for feare unto him, that was strongest for the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alledging the same feare for their excuse? Wherefore he thought it most behoovefull to win King Philip of Macedon unto their party: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to re coytle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince; and one that had means to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to joyne with them; the benefit likely to redound unto himselfe, by their society, was a very strong Argument: though indeede what need was there, of proving by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said Hee, These Ætolians here present; and namely, this Thoas, being lately Embassadour from them into Asia, among other Motives which he then used to excite the King unto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told us that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly insulgence of the Romans: likening that king to some wilde beast, that was chained or lockt up within some grate, and would faine break loose. If this be so: let us breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, that he may regaine his liberty, and satisfie his angry stomacke, upon those that are common enemies to us and him. But if it prove otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoove us to looke unto him; that he may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending us. I am sure Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Army: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage; let Seleucus be in readinesse to fall upon Macedon, and finde him work to defend his owne on the other side, without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip; and the present war in Greece. But more generally for the manning of this great enterprise, wherein you are now embarqued against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: wherein you then gave eare. The Romans by this time should have heard of other news, than that Chalcis in Euboea was become ours. Italy & Gaul should have bin on fire with war; and, little to their comfort, they should have understood, that Hannibal was againe come into Italy. Neither doe I see what should hinder us even now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet and Army hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, laden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we have here too few bands, and too many mouths.) Wherefore let the one halfe be employed against Italy; whilst you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make commensace, as if you were even ready to follow us into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my advice; who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of Warre; yet how to war with the Romans, I have been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsell which I give, I promise you my faithfull and diligent service for the execution: but what counsell soever you please to follow, I wish it may bee prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken bravely: but of all this was nothing done; save only that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessaly; about which they had before disputed. There when they had wonne one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissæ, that was chiefe of the Country, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Army. Their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babius, a Roman Proprietor, did send help thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe enemy unto Antiochus; whereby the fame of the succour comming to Larissæ, grew such, as wrought more than the succour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountains tops afare off; thought that a great Army of Romans and Macedonians had been comming upon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yeare; He brake up his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in love with a young Maiden, daughter unto a Citizen of the Towne; whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in yeares and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following as delightfully as hee could, without thinking upon the War in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise, that when he took the field, he might evidently perceive in what loose manner of discipline his Army had passed the winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and help him to reclaim them from this loosenesse of nuptiall Revels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: unto whom fell a charge, of far lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had bin long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate for very feare and superstition, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him, as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Divell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gave such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Province; or arrogate more unto himselfe, than his lot should afford him. This unpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make Warre against the Boians; wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder service, requiring the more ability in matter of War. But M. Acilius went over into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and fifteen Elephants. Ptolomy King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Ætolia, there to assist the Consul in this War. Ptolomee sent also gold and silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too young; and dwelt too farre off. So his money was returned unto him with thanks; and his loving offer as lovingly refused. Unto Philips Embassadors answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that Hee should give to Acilius the Consul.

Consull. Masaniſſa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strive, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantity of graine; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein Masaniſſa far out-went the poor City of Carthage; as also in that he offered to lend the Consull five hundred Horſe, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertook to set out a Fleet at their owne charges: and to bring in at one payment, all the Tribute-mony which was behind, and ought to be discharged by many yearly pensions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them receive themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne, it was accepted, with condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The haste and ridiculous issue of this War, that began with such noyse and preparation, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great between the Roman ons, and the Asiaticke souldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, and the same manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to prove their excuse, when they should againe forsake him. But King Philip and Nabius having recovered many places; and the Roman Consull being arrived, against whom none made resistance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian rooke and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Consull, made a mocking-stock, and sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians used much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their cities, one after another, gave up themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne lives, and departing unarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them stayed behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus; who having withdrawne himselfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out upon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toyle during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, hee found all the promises of the Aetolians merely verball: and himselfe reduced into termes of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal 30 as a wise man, yea, a very Prophet, that had foretold all this long before. Nevertheless, he sent word to the Aetolians, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their owne need to be no lesse than his. But the Aetolians had cause to think, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus, who having promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill up the same ten thousand which hee first brought over. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joined with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thous and his fellowes had done their best in vaine, to have made all the Nation take Armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came over to him out of Asia, nor his friends of 40 Greece would appear in this time of danger: hee seized upon the Streights of Thermopyle, as meaning to defend them against the Romans, untill more helpe should come. Of the Streights of Thermopyle, there hath beene spoken enough before, upon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Army of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessaly, were unable to passe that Ledge of Mountaines, dividing the one halfe of Greece; unless they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handful of men, defended this passage two or three dayes together, against a World of men comming to invade the Country. The latter, having taken upon him to 50 doe great miracles, and effect what he listed himselfe in Greece: did commit himselfe unto the safety of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Army. There whilst he lay, he sent earnest messengers one after another to the Aetolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus; but at least wise now to helpe, and keepe the toppes of the Mountaines, lest the Romans, finding any by-path, should come downe upon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertook to inake good the few passages: by which onely and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consull in like sort, prepared to force the the Streights: without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sicknesse from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them been Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men; to try whether by any meanes they could get up to the Aetolians. He himselfe encouraged his Army: not onely by telling them with what bafe conditioned enemies they had to deale: but what rich kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battell. All that night Cato had a fore journey (for what happened unto L. Valerius it is uncertaine, save onely that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tyred, with climbing up steepie Rocks and crooked waies: He commanded them to repose themselves; whilst hee, being a very able man of body, rooke in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, he found at length a path: which he rooke to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading unto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not named, because in time of peace, there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopyle been so often the Seat of War, as might cause any travellers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet it did lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there 20 untill day-light: by which hee discovered both the Campe of the Greekes underneath him; and some of the Aetolians very neare unto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a lusty Crue of his men, whom he thought fittest for that service; and willed them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby understood, that these Aetolians were no more than sixe hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set upon the Aetolians, overthrew them, flew a great part of them, and chased the rest, that by flying to their Campe, guided him unto it. The fight was already begun betweene the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Campe, found 30 in a manner a desperate piece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe, which occupied the whole breadth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kind of service; but by Archers and Slingers, that were placed over them on the Hill-side, and powdered down a shower of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first that the Aetolians had beene comming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and ensignes were discovered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsook the Camp, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badnesse of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this daies losse drove Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence with the first opportunity, got him back into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and intreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves unto the Consull, in manner of suppliants. Briefely, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Aetolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consull give them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis, he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to joyne with him against Antiochus: over whom since the victory was already gotten, He did gratulate unto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Aetolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consull should besiege Heraclea, and Philip Lamia, 50 at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who faine would have taken Lamia before the Consull should come to help him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that used to worke by Myne, were overmuch hindered by the stony ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Consull, having won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoile of these townes was a reward unto those that had fought at Thermopyle. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Antiochus that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himselfe: untill such time as another Consull was ready to ease him of his charge.

The losse of Heracles did so affright the Aetolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent unto King Antiochus presently after his flight: intreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing withheld him from comming in person, at least wise to helpe them with money and other aide. They prayed him to consider, that this did not only concerne him in honour; but appertained unto his owne safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Aetolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any enemies at their backs, might set upon him in Asia. He considered well of this, and found their words true. Therefore He delivered unto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might serve to defray the charges of the Warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aide, both by Land and Sea. Thobas, another of their Embassadors, Hee retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might urge the King to make his word good. But when Heracles was taken from them; then did the Aetolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suit unto the Consul to obtaine peace, upon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to give them audience, but said, He had other businesse in hand; onely he granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much as they would have delivered unto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata, they began, as men favouring their owne cause, to alledge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so even betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves unto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing unto the faith, signified, in their use of it, little else than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans used those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as * yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: Hee asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was; and shewed him the decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said he, I command you first of all, That none of you presume to goe into Asia, upon any businesse private or publicke: then, That ye deliver up unto me Dicaearchus the Aetolian, Menesstratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countymen as have followed him in revolting from us. Whilest he was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the custome of the Greekes, who had yielded themselves unto his faith; not unto slavery. What? (said the Consul) Doe ye stand to plead Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted unto every one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He, nor yet the Apoletti or ordinary Councell of the Nation, were able to fulfill these injunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause hee entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted unto him Truce for so long.

This successe of Warre, during ten, and other ten daies together, began presently after the taking of Heracles; when Philip had bene commanded away from Lamia, that else he might have wonne. Now because of the indignity herein offered unto that King, and to the end that he might not returne home with his Army, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set upon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Aetolians; taking for his reward, all that he could get. And hee got in that space all Athamania, Perthabia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Aetolians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for Warre, yet they could not endure to heare more talke of Peace. And it happened, that that Nicander about the same time was come back from Antiochus, with money & hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heracles & Philip having lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His money Nicander conveyed into Lamia, by very unskillfull dexterity. But he himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Aetolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was very much perplexed about this his journey, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as farre as he could from the Roman side, fell upon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led unto their King. He expected no good; but either to be delivered unto the Romans, or used ill enough by Philip. But it seemed, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignity, of his being sent away from Lamia. For he commanded his servants to entreat Nicander friendly: and he himselfe being then at supper, did visit him as soone as he rose up: giving him to understand, That the Aetolians did now reape the fruits of their own madnesse; forasmuch as they could never hold themselves contented, but would needs be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus; but himselfe being their neighbour, they could never well endure. It was now therefore, he said, high time for them to have regard unto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had never made any triall: for surely their good affection, one unto the other, would be much more available unto each of them, than their mutual catching of advantages, whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to signifie unto his Countymen; and privately to hold in minde the courtesie which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giving him a Convey to guard him to Hypata, he lovingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicander was alwaies after dutifully affected to the crown of Macedon: so as in the war of Perseus he made himselfe suspected unto the Romans, and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul understood, that the Aetolians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it: he forthwith meant to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whether he therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceived it: for it was a strong City, and well manned. But Acilius stood upon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should have bene a loser, by rising from before it without Victory. So he staid there welneere all the following time of his Consulship; whilest the Macedonian King and the Achaens made farre better use of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had revolted unto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hasty course of Victory, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Achaens called to account the Eleans and Messenians: which had long bene added to the Aetolian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gave good words; whereby they saved themselves from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other helpe when the Achaen Prætor wasted their Countrey, than to offer themselves unto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinib: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that unto the Achaens it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achaen Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus, caused the Messenians to annex themselves unto the Achaens, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Majestie of a Roman Embassadour. Titus did favour the Achaens; yet could not like it wel, that either they or any other should take too much upon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans upon even terms; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus; which had once bin Philips, and was afterward given by him to Aminander, who sent a Governor thither. But when Aminander in this present warre, was driven out of his own Kingdome by Philip; then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Land to the Achaens; whom he found ready Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Carvers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Achaens referred themselves unto his discretion. So he told them, that their Commonwealth was like a Tortoise, whereof Peloponnesus was the shell; and that, holding themselves within that compass, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Having settled things thus in Peloponnesus, he went over to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Consul had laine two moneths, that might have bene faire better spent. There, whether out of compassion which he had upon the Aetolians, or out of dislike of King Philip thriving so fast: he perswaded the Consul to grant unto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitting themselves, crave pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Aetolians have made such earnest suit as they did unto Tim, for procuring of this favour. But if Glabrio had bin sure to carry it in any short space, it may well be thought he would not have gone away without it; since the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would have made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came unto Rome, no entreaty could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That either they should wholly submit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand talents, and make neither peace nor war with any, further than as the Romans should give approbation. They had not so much money: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they should give themselves away unto discretion, which what it signified, they now understood. Wherefore they desired to have it set down, in what points, & how far forth they should yeeld unto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certain answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vain attendance.

Whilest the Aetolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consul had little to do in Greece; and therefore took upon him gravely to set things in order among the tractable Achaens. He would have had them to restore the banished Lacedaemonians home into their Countie; and to take the Elleans into the fellowship of their Commonwealth. This the Achaens liked well enough; but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedaemonians: intending to make it an Act of their own meere grace. As for the Elleans, they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Achaens: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted, and saw that they should have their desire, without such compulsive mediation.

The Roman Admirall C. Lelium, much about the same time, fought a battell at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twenty saile of Rhodiens came after the battell, when they were following the Chase. The Kings Fleet was the better of saile; but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in a fight, was yet out of danger; as soon as he betook himselfe to a speedy retreat.

And such end had the first yeers war between King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vain hopes of the Aetolians, were glad to excuse themselves by feare, thinking themselves happy when by Embassadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemy of late unto the Romans, did now send to congratulate this their victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored unto him Demetrius his younger son; whom some few yeeres they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolomie of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby refreshed. In which regard he desired the Senate not to forellow time; but to send an Armie, as soon as might be, into Asia: promising that his assistance, whereinsoever it pleased them to use it, should not be wanting. This Ptolomie was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of fortune. He understood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The same did Antiochus now begin to suspect, who had thought himselfe a while as safe at Ephesus, as if he had bin in another world: but was told by Hannibal, that it was not so far out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italy into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soon be there, and make him trie the chance of a battell for his kingdome.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Aetolians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome business by Sea, and divers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes his Kingdome; with the siege of Pergamus, raised by an bandfull of the Achaens. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battell of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their victorie. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph over Antiochus, is surnamed The Asiaticque, as his brother was called The African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lelium. Lelium was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Provinces, without putting it to the hazzard of a Lottery. Lucius having talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time bin put unto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous to make an unblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent, P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the war against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controversie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied upon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captain, what better man could they oppose, than Scipio: that had bin victorious against that same Great Worthy? But indeed a worse man might have served well enough the turn. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in confusion: where his wisdom was so much approved, but his liberty and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance, as a signe of the freedom that he used in his censures, even whilest he lived in such a Court. Antiochus mustered his Armie in presence of this famous Captain: thinking, as may seem, to have made him wish, that he had bin served by such brave men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of gold, silver, and purple, as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought, and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most covetous men in all the world: meaning, that all his cost upon the backs of cowardly Asiaticques, was no better than a spoyle to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the king, it is easie to ghesse. The little use that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the use of his service, when he stood in greatest necessity thereof.

The Scipios made all haste away from Rome as soon as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the war, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had served under P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinqueremes Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed unto L. Emilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeere for that voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphissa a City of the Aetolians. The Aetolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne, but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlessly, as in a time of confusion, they had left unregarded the last yeere. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and fell upon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went he to Amphissa: which he had almost gotten, when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphissa was presently forsaken by the Inhabitants: but they had a Castle, or higher Town, that was impregnable; whereto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Aetolians:

lians: entreating him to stand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gave them gentle words, and willed them to perswade the Aetolians, that they should faithfully and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Consull made still the same answer, with which they had bin chafed from Rome. The Conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from war: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate; or any helpfull commoditie which time should afford. So they obtained halfe a yeeres truce: after which, the winter was like to afford them another half yeeres leisure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time lost, which with-held the War from passing over into Asia.

The businesse of Aetolia being thus laide aside, and the old Consull Glabbrio sent home into Italy, the Scipio's marched into Thessaly; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace unto the Hellepont. Yet they considered, That hereby they must commit themselves unto the loyaltie of King Philip: who might either do them some mischief by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable advantage: or at the least, would be unfaithfull; though he were not so courageous, yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that even for want of victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they should be disgracefully forced to returne. He had promised them the utmost of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make somateriall; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post unto him, and observe his doings as he should take him on the sudden. The King was merry at a feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he lovingly bade welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what provision of victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made bridges over the rivers, and mended the bad ways by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracchus returned backe in haste unto the Scipio's: who entering into Macedon, found all things in a readinesse, that might helpe to advance their journey. The King entertained them royally, and brought them on their way, even to the Hellepont: where they stayed a good while, untill their Navie was in readinesse to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Aniochus, was a banished Rhodian: true to the King; and desirous of revenge upon his Country-men, that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea, thought to doe somewhat upon those that were so early in their diligence, before their fellowes should arrive to helpe them. Yet went he craftily to worke, and sent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requitt thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was beleevd: and the Rhodian Admirall grew so carelesse, expecting still when he should receive a watch-word from Polyxenidas, that he himselfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Haven. The Kings Fleet setting forth from Ephesus by night; and, for feare of being discovered, resting one day in harbour by the way, came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was ready to enter the Haven. Paussistratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Haven; so to guard the mouth of it: for that he saw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed some Companies in another part of the Iland: which falling upon the backe of Paussistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboard. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies rooke him out of all order, and sunke or boarded all his Navie, five excepted, that by a sudden device made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Crescent upon two poles at the Beake-head; and then rowed forwards directly upon the Enemy: who having not bethought himselfe what shift to make against such unexpected danger of firing, was content to give way unto these desperate Gallies: for feare lest they should burne, together with themselves, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest: whereof Polyxenidas could not take such advantage as he had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, hee was driven backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they

they were not discouraged, set forth twenty other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes, repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great bravery, presented battell to Polyxenidas before the Haven of Ephesus. When he durst not accept it: they vvent from place to place, attempting many things, as either they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance made against them at Land.

Eumenes vvith his Fleet was compelled to forsake them; and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdome. For Antiochus wasted all the grounds about Elaa and Pergamus: and leaving his sonne Seleucus to besiege the royall City of Pergamus: did vvith the rest of his Army spoyle the vvhole Countrey thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; having vvith him no better men to defend the City, than vvhere they that lay against it. Wherefore he had reason to stand in feare; being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Acheans: old souldiers all, and trained up under Philopamen, vvhole Scholler, in the art of war, Diophanes their Commander vvvas. This Diophanes, beholding from the walls of Pergamus, which was an high Town, the demeanour of the enemy, began to disdain that such men as they should hold them besieged. For Seleucus his army which was encamped at the hill-foot, seeing that none durst fall forth upon them, grew so carelesse: as otherwise than by spoyling all behind their backs, they seemed to forget that they were in an enemies countrey. Diophanes therefore spake vvith Attalus: and told him that he vvould go forth to visit them. Attalus had no liking to this adventure; for he said, that the match was nothing equal. But the Achean vvould needs have his vvill: and issuing forth, encamped not far from the enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers, they vvondered at first what his meaning was; but when they saw that he held himself quiet, they thought it was a jest of his boldnesse; & laughed to see vvith what a handful of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned unto their former negligence & disorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his men to follow him, even as fast as they vvell might: & he himself, vvith the hundred horse, brake out on the sudden upon the station that was next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their Horses ready saddled, but more few, or none had the hearts to make resistance: so as he drave them all out of their Camp; and chased them as farr as he might safely adventure, vvith great slaughter of them, and no losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (vvho had covered the walls of the Towne, men and women, to behold this spectacle) vvvere very joyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of these Acheans. Yet vvould they not therefore issue forth of their gates, to helpe the Acheans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than he had done before: and against him vvvent forth Diophanes the second time; vvho quietly rested a vvhile in his old Station. When they had stayed many houres, looking vvho should begin: Seleucus, in faire order as he came, vvithdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moved not vvithlett the Enemy was in fight: but as soone as the ground betwene them hindred the prospect, hee followed them in all haste, and soone overtaking them vvith his Horse, charged them in Rere; so as hee brake them, and vvith all his forces pursued them at the heeles, to their very Trenches. This boldnesse of the Acheans, and the basenesse of his owne men, caused Seleucus to quit the siege, little to his honour. Such being the qualitie of these Asiaticques, Philopamen had cause to tell the Romans, That he envied their vvictory. For when Antiochus lay fasting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his souldiers betook themselves to Riot, as it had bin in a time of great security: a good man of war might have cut all their throats, even as they were tripling in their vvictualling houses, vvich Philopamen said that he vvould have done, had he bin General of the Acheans, and not, as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of businesse: and turning his care from one thing to another, vvith a great deale of travell, brought almost nothing to passe. He had beene at Pergamus: into vvich Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himselfe vvith a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his son, as before hath beene shewed, and went to Elaa: vvithin he heard that Emilius the Roman Admirall was come to bring succor to Eumenes. There he made an Overture of peace: about vvich to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Emilius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made vvithout the Consull: this Treatie brake off. Then followed the

the overthrow newly mentioned; which caused Selenus to give over the siege of Per-gamus. Afterwards, foure or five Townes of like name were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of seven and thirty Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Countie of Antiochus, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in a manner as great hurt as they could doe to Apollonius; and having the victory taken out of his hands by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not farre adventure upon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Prefaces unto the warre, the last and greatest was a victory of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battell was fought by Myonnesus a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him foure-score and nine Gallies; and five of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, where-with Antiochus vaunted the last yeere, That his Armada should cover all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodian two and twenty: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timbered and thin plancked, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselves by the same device, with which five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran upon the enemy: who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemped. After no long fight, the Kings Navie hoysed saile: and, having a faire wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet forty of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof thirteen were taken, all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellows lost only two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Masterie of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seeme to have taken from Antiochus all use of reason. For as if no hope had bin remaining to defend those places that he held in Europe, he presently withdrew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily have been kept, even till the end of Winter following, and have reduced the besiegers (if the siege had been continued obstinately) unto termes of great extremity. He also gave over the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought save onely of defence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for help to his Father-in-law, King Ariarabes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellepont, but had yeelded unto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in a readinesse to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that he landed quietly at his owne good ease; even as if the Countie had been his already. The first newes that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Embassadour that came to sue for peace. This Embassadour declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampsacus, and Lysimachia, had beene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already given over Lysimachia, and was further purposed, not to strive with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with warre? If it was their desire, that any other Townes upon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at libertie, or otherwise delivered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not be uncertaine, and it should be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough, the King would likewise beare halfe the charges, whereat they had been in this Warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not be too insolent upon confidence of their fortune, he expected their answer. These offers which to the Embassadour seemed so great, were judged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since it began through his owne fault: and that He should not onely depart out of those few Townes, which he held in Eolis and Ionis, but quite out of Asiaticke lesse, and keep himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadour therefore saw, that that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne; who (it is uncertaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his sonne, than upon Condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publique businesse: He onely said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your King in my name, that I would advise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may have peace.

The King was not any whit moved with this advice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no lesse, than if he had beene already subdued: little reason there was that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to avoid it he must give away. He had with him three-score and tenne thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fifty Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hooks or fythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countries. Yet was he nothing pleased, to heare that the Consul drew neere him apace, as one halting to fight. But howsoever he was affected; He made so little shew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sick at Elaea, He sent thither unto him his son without ransom: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sicknesse, and without desirous to retaine the young Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus ought his bountie to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein hee dealt craftily. For since he could have none other ransom of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courtesie before the battell, as would afterwards have beene little worth; than to stay untill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recoverie of his sonne: so as the joy thereof was thought, to have beene much available unto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanity, Hee said onely thus much unto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by advising him not to fight untill he shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to conjecture. Antiochus resolved to follow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, unto Magnesia by Sipylos: where encamping, He fortified himselfe as strongly as he could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul, and sate downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slew some; and were anon, with some losse, driven backe over the River. Two daies were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, untill they came within two miles and a halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There as they were taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foote: whom the ordinary Corps de garde repelled. Foure dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul tooke advice what was to be done. For either they must fight upon whatsoever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore subject unto many difficulties: unless they would staine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more convenient place; and so defer the warre untill the next Spring. The Roman Souldier was thoroughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the Generall Crie, That this great Army should be assailed, even in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discovering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set upon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in feare of the Enemy, resolved to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battels:

S i f f i

H c

Hee also did the like; and advanced so farre, that they might understand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Army consisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points; the Romans in the meane battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were divided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them follow the Principes, at such distance as was usuall; and last of all, the Tritarii. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Achaans, and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Utmost of all (save some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the River: yet foure Troupes of Horse were placed there, though such helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Consul had with him sixteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they onely would have served to discourage his men; as being sure to bee beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more courageous beastes: whereof Antiochus had likewise much advantage in number.

The Kings Army being compounded of many Nations, diversly appointed, and not so all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the severall kinds, in such wise as each might be of most use. The maine strength of his Foot consisted in fixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These he placed in the middest, and divided into tenne Battalions: every one having two and thirty in File, and fifty in Front. Betwene every Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beastes, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their backs, and besides him that governed the Elephant, four men in every Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were fixteene hundred Horse of the Gallio-Greeks: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and a Regiment of almost a thousand horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrey, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horse, divided in their severall kinds, doe seeme to have followed one another in depth, rather than to have bin stretched out in Front. Adjoyning unto these, were fixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment; called the Argyr'spides, or Silvershields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had served under Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archers on horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Myfia; with foure thousand Slingers and Archers of the Ciriens, and Elymeans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallio-Greeks, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of divers Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called The Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with hooks or rhythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon sat Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serve to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cicilians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyriens, Elymeans; and many others, having also with them sixteen Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The first on-fict was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse; the other, to break the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatened by them both. For with shottings, and noisies, and some wounds, they were driven out of the field; and running backe upon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged upon the left wing: whereas they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with with such varietie of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance; but all of them fled; in a manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite unto him, weakly flanked with Horse: gave upon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Aemilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued forth with all his power to helpe his fellows: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renew the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach; He not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away upon the spur without further tarrance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to have lost in this battaile fifty thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slaine above three hundred Foot, and foure and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custody of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townes-men and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatnesse of the Overthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yielded up themselves by Embassadours: whom they sent to the Romans, whilest they were on the way. Neither were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Campe: having none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose upon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leave to make the answer, because it should bee gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their charges in that Waire, they required fixteene thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should have confirmed the peace; and the other twelve thousand, in twelve yeeres next ensuing, by even portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some store of Corne, that was due to him upon a reckoning. Now besides twenty hostages which they required, very earnest they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Ætolian, with some others who had stirred up the King to this warre, delivered into their hands. But any wise man might so easily have perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassadour had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enjoyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to send immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fulvius, & Cn. Manlius Volsco. The Ætolians desired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make warre upon the Ætolians; the other, upon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes that Antiochus was already vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe unto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to be so thoroughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soone after this, came the Embassadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yea, by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approved. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his owne deserts; and comparing himselfe with Masanissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had bene to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masanissa was onely such in title; and since both he and his Father had alwayes bene their friends, even in the worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what hee would have: He still referring himselfe to their courtisie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At length he craved that they would bestow upon him, as much of the Conque by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giving liberty to many of the Greece Towns, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Towns had been partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodiens did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian liberty; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had bin subject unto Philip, and served him in his War: which was not alledged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the maine point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifullly gave away so much, that every one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted unto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not only that of Titus Quinius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld untill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had been given unto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of the Asiaticque: which the fortune of his Victory had no lesse deserved; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Æoliens, and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sybil. Of Sybils Prophecies; the Bookes of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobility.

M*ARC. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius* had the same charge divided betweene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Æoliens. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it selfe to the Roman Majestie, it was now to be brought unto more lowly termes than any other of the Greeks. The best was, that so great a storme fell not unexpected upon the Æoliens. They had foreseene the danger, when their Embassadours were utterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedy; which was, to entreate the Rhodiens and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neither were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well devise, even upon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied advantage.

Poore King Aminander lived in exile among them, whilst Philip of Macedon kept for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that many of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) having beene long accustomed to serve a Mountaine Lord, that conversed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, used by the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, & offered their service towards his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fifty, which undertooke the worke. Yet, assistance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Æoliens, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fifty adventurers, having divided themselves into foure parts, occupied, by the ready assistance of the multitude, foure of the chiefe Towns in the Countrey, to his use. The fame of this good successe at first; with divers letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Licutenantsof Philip unable to thinke upon resistance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few dayes; giving thereby some leisure unto his King to pro-

provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home fixe thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all fave two thousand behinde him, and so came to Atheneum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying over Argibeas, that was chiefe of the Countrey. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King had the boldenes to defend upon Argibeas for that they might perceive the Athamanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come downe upon them, when they should be bufe. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially when Aminander came in fight with his thousand Æoliens. The Macedonians were called backe, from wards Argibeas, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athamanians and Æoliens way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine flight, with great losse of men and armes, few of those escaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, untill Philip his returne.

The Æoliens having found the businesse of Athamanian so easie, made an attempt in their owne behalfe, upon the Amphilochians and Aperanians. These had belonged unto their Nation, & were lately taken by Philip, from whom they diligently revolted, and became Æolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had bene ever belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke Armes at first: but soone layed them away; seeing their neighbours ready to fight with them in the Æolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the joy was the lesse; for that newes came of Antiochus his last overthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Consull his halffing with an Armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate not to take it in deslight, that he had recovered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly City, that had bene the chiefe seate of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Æoliens: yet could not by them be relieved, unless they would adventure to fight upon equal ground. To help the Ambraciens, it was not in the Æoliens power: for they were at the same time, vexed by the Ilyrians at sea, and ready to be driven from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were unable to deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadours came, who besought the Consull to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not bee terrified, by any violence of the Assailants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consull had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so bee driven to leave unto his successfull the honour of finishing the Warre. Wherefore hee gladly hearkened unto the Æoliens, and bade them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it over-deare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gave leave to Aminander, offering his service as a mediator, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such as was grievous to the weaker, but not unsufferable. The same Embassadours of the Athenians and Rhodiens, accompanied those of the Æoliens to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made a very grievous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Æoliens were bound to uphold the Majestie of the people of Rome, and to observe divers Articles, which made them the lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they having been the first that called these their Masters into the Countrey. The Ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achaens, by stiffly pressing their owne right) that so they might have possession along the coast of Greece, whilst they seemed to forbeare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philop. or others, might lay claime, there was set down an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to have the Romans Judges of their controversies, when they should arise. And hereof good use will be shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, upon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

10 Cn. Manlius, the other Confull, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victorie, his acts were the confirmation. He visited those Countreies on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, & some that were together at Warres, without regard of the great alteration that hapned in Asia. From every of these hee got somewhat; and by their quarrells found occasion to visite those Provinces, into which he should else have wanted an errand. He was even laden with booty, when, having fetcht a compass about Asia, he came at length upon the Gallo-Greeks. These had long domineered over the Countrey: though of late times, it was rather the fame & terror of their fore-passed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them up in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they served under King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt upon the River Halys, in an In-land Countrey, where those enemies were not very like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation; that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yield: then was no counsaile thought fo good, as to forsake their houses and Countrey, and, with all that they could carry or drive, to betake themselves unto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Confull would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled, and that finally, when he had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greeks had beene carelesse of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if stones would have served well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of Armes, than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily prevail against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks, who neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their stones before-hand, but catching up what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensive Armes, could not hold out against the Arrows and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driven from a piece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong downe the steepe rockes. Few of the men escaped alive: all their wives, children, and goods became a prey unto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation overcome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them saved themselves by flight, as having fairer way at 50 their backs.

These warres being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconfull, his Province for another yeere. Fulvius, in his second yeer, did little or nothing. Manlius gave peace to those whom he had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for feare of the Roman Armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid upon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto hee swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadours, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellepont, laden with spoile, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many yeers extorted, from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Army of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull use, which the Roman Souldier had bene wont to take as the onely good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous household-stuffe, and slaves of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banquets, and in a word, with the seedes of that luxurie, which finally overgrew and choked the Roman vertue.

10 The Countrey of Thrace lay between Hellepont & the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might provoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philop. of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with a huge train of baggage; the Thracians could not so wel contain themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philop. tooke it otherwise than very pleasantly, to have this Roman Army robbed, & well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he understood, and afterwards gave the Romans to understand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the people of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered unto himselfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Ætoliens, promising moreover to restore unto him all the Greek Cities, that had beene taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no even dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to give away not onely the halfe of Asia, but Chersonesus, & Lyfimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas upon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobility to goe to Rome and begge Provinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained lovingly the two Scipios, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was grown into neer acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby he made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spain and Africke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipios had not the disposing of that which they wonne from Antiochus; as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philop. therefore saw these uppstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe unregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that he had joyned with Antiochus and the Ætoliens, by whom he might have bene freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentedness the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be urged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleevied, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Countrey. They knew all advantages; & they fell, unexpected, upon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farre advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behinde: though both the getting and the saving, did cost many lives, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought untill it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the booty, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly taxe, as an unworthy commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answer, and was approved by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to have hindred the peace with Antiochus; they

they said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Army over Taurus, and adventuring upon the calamity threatened by Sibyls verses, unto those that should passe the fatal bounds. What calamity or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophetic threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe over Taurus, I doe not conceive. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened unto him the way, & had before-hand won, in a sort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophetic, fell out neere about one time, with the restitution of Ptolomy King of Egypt, that was forbidden unto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to have had reference unto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen upon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, sowed at random in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by event; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolomy to his Kingdome by Gabinus the Roman, should have any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers have bene well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that prophetic. Of the Sibylline predictions, I have sometimes thought reverently: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke few men know) yet following the common believe and good authority. But observation of the shameful Idolatry, that upon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well prevailed upon my credulity, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent worke of Master Cassaubon upon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent, That not only those prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Christ fo plainly was shewed, but even the bookes of Hermes, which have borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoever devised them) by the undiscreet zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forein proofs. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable History, reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should have bene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it bene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criusisme, taken amiss in place of Semoni Sango: a title four hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Pitrucius a Rebél, had many ages before bene consecrated Semoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought upon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now passeth for a true History. Such conjectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historical, than was conceived by the Authour. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme upon a sure foundation) leane over-hardly on a well painted, yet so rotten post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richest, which ever the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those monies which the common-wealth had borrowed from private men, in the second Punicke War. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, even so long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, untill the

the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after other, into judgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Posterity. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such unworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Country. When therefore his day of answer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the midst of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, he told the people, That upon they same day of the year he had fought a great battaile with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke War by a signall victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law; but intended to visite the Capitoll, & there give thanks to Jupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well & happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if ever since the seventeenth yeer of his life, untill he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had prevented the capacity of his age; yet his deserts had exceeded the greatness of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their City might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, even the Officers of the court, followed Scipio, leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne slaves and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgement, untill for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, unrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the City, and his unthankfull Romans, that could suffer him to undergoe so much indignity. The rest of his time he spent at Luternum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome againe. How many yeers he lived, or whether he lived one whole yeere, in this voluntary banishment; it is uncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopemen, as also of his private behaviour at Luternum, render it probable, that he out-lived the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to have drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Collegues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoever it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to work with L. Scipio the Africke. They propounded a Decree unto the people, touching mony received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; that the Senate should give charge unto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and judicially determine thereof. In favour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, & instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of singular industrie; frugal also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde he was even faultie: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he unmercifull and unconcionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice, which being poisoned with envie, troubled both himselfe and the whole City, whilst he lived. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobility, especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his own ranke, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabbrio, whose Lieutenant he had bene at Thermopyle, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carry it, he took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perjurie. That he had not brought into the common Treasury some vessels of gold and silvers, gotten in the Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare unto the Scipio's, grew partly, (besides his generall spight at the Nobility) from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was given unto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lyes he published, or for want of judgement, thinking unworthily of the vertue that was farre above him, Cato filled Rome with untrue reports against his Generall; whose noble noble deedes confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought upon by the Scipio's, whilst it was nourished by their enemy, brake out upon advantage, especially against L. Scipio: his brother being dead, or out of the way. A severe inquiry and judgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soone condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his body should have beene laid up in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the use of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his having beene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had beene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and Clients, made such a Collection for him, as would have set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. He tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessary use, being redeemed for him by his neerest friends.

And thus began the civill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, untill now, since the Punicke Warre. Security of danger from abroad; and some want of sufficient employment, were especiall helps to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold upon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while containe themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrelsome businesse, grew to perfection, they that found themselves over-matched by their adversaries at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first, with clubs & stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frays & murders in the streets, unto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sons was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two sons, whilst they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not revenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senators began to take upon them authority, more than was to them belonging. They conferred upon the Consuls all the whole power of the City, under this forme, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweale receive no detriment. By this decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to have wonne a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saurinus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way: it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the civill warres; which giving unto Sylla, who prevailed therein, means to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cesar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soveraign power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was provoked. It is true, that never any Consul had finally cause to rejoyce, of his having put in execution such authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in need of a Sovereigne Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Cesar, or give him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith prevailing against his adversaries, he tooke such order, that neither Senate nor people, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedom, and became subiects unto the arbitrary government of one: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke upon them as the highest Lords on earth, to doe even what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto unto compleat greatnesse, nor beleevd of her selfe as if she had, whilst a King late crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and upholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought upon betimes, How it was effected, the sequel will discover.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian Warre.

S. 1.

- 10 The Conduition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They deale insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being unreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his son Demetrius; of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

30 AFTER the overthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the same Laws and Magistrates, as they formerly had been, before the arrivall of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publique declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or unto Sovereign power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Laws, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Monie, &c. to reserve (as the French call it) le dernier Ressort, or the last Appeals, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeals, or last resort, as every petty injurie offered to each other by the forenamed Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places wherence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome; from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, He or they were beaten, and informed to obedience, or had their Estates and Regalities utterly dissolved. Nevertheless it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Officers of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither the Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard unto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

40 And to such degree of servitude the severall Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankfull for their deliverance from a yoke more sensibly grievous; or, as being skilfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chief hope of thriving; or, as being more fearefull of displeasing the strongest than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes living further off, & being most obsequious unto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformity unto them in matter of war & peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to use his owne even as he listed, untill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little available to him, that his Kingdome bordered upon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For upon the same reason (as well as upon his owne high deserts) were they very loving unto Masaniissa, and to his House, untill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion seated in Africke: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subjection unto themselves, by the Ministry of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were useful and obsequious unto them.

50 Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; & shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But such magnanimity was none otherwise continued by the Romans, than as want of due reverence to their estate, and a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not indure. Wherefore notwithstanding that he had lately given passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the wayes for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull to transport them over the Hellespont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet upon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ezus and Maronea, Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, even from the Romans themselves.

These townes of Enus and Maronea had beene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the North-west, extended his dominion very far. He is thought to have made himself Lord of Transylvania: in which Province it is said, * That innumerable Medals of gold have beene found, in the age of our Grand-Fathers, each of them weighing two or three Crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Vishoria. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title, for he lived not to settle his estate in Europe fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of war, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolemy Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Anigonius the sonne of Demetrius, and his successors: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gauls being over-past, those Countries which lately had beene oppressed by them, recovered their liberty; and not onely held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to finde their advantages, and make use of them, even upon Macedon: Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, King Philip did provide the most convenient remedies: by shutting up the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behooved him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Etolians, of wrongfull usurpation and oppression, in his having occupied Lysimachia. Hereto hee made a good answer. That his Garrison did only save it from the Thracians: who, as soone as he thence withdrew his men, did seize upon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have said, touching Enus and Maronea: That they were places unable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not availed him, in the disputation about Lysimachia: & in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title: since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrey thereabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former warre: and since they, by their victory, had gotten unto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only submitted his right unto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it unto their disposition, Whether Enus & Maronea should be set at liberty: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed upon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonnesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceive, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Judges betweene him and all that made complaint upon him, gave sentence against him in every controversie. Nevertheless, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintaine his right unto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equity (if it might prevaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Etolians: wherein whatsoever he had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either he was likely to prevaile, or at leastwise to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what he had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him, than had beene their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their liberty, he tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature he was very cruell) gave order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might have little joy of the liberty by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians

Thracians by night, that they might sack the Towne, and use all cruelties of War. This was done: but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could have beene feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majesty, to an account. He would have removed the blame from himselfe, and layed it even upon the Maronites: affirming, that they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embassadors to enquire among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who survived, were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more severe, and more thoroughly informed in the business, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, That if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not been at Maronea, nor neare to it, he requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour so lightly to give away his friends. As for Cassander, because he should tell no tales; Hee tooke order to have him paysoned by the way. By this wee see, that the doctrine, which Machiavel taught unto Cesar Borgia, to employ men in mischievous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they have performed the mischiefe, was not of his owne invention. All ages have given us examples of this goodly policie, the latter having bene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth, here in England, can beare good witness; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same unjust Law that himselfe had devised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an unpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to have brought upon him the Warre which he feared, before he was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his younger son Demetrius as Embassador unto the Senate: giving him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints, and withall to deliver his own grievances in such wise, that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that he had been strongly urged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all even for the present. Demetrius himselfe was known to be very acceptable unto the Senate; as having been well approved by them, when he was Hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely to prevaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would be borne unto his person.

Whilst this business with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilst he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to divert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadors, that had beene Judges betweene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controversies which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedaemonians against the Acheans. It was objected unto the Acheans, That they had committed a grievous slaughter upon many Citizens of Lacedaemon: That unto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the City: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycurgus, then Pretor of the Acheans, made answer, That these banished Lacedaemonians, who now tooke upon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamefully they laid the blame upon others: the Acheans having onely called those unto judgement, that were supposed to be chiefe Authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans: and these Plaintiffs having slaine them, upon private, though just hatred, as they were comming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the Walles of Lacedaemon, he said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his Ordinance: who, having perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and liberty by their proper vertue, did inhibit unto them all kinds of fortifications: as the Rerails and Nets either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedaemon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Usurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these walls and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his ordinances; and governed the City by their owne lawlesse Will. As for the Acheans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, unto the Lacedemonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycurtus plainly told App. Claudius, the chiefe of the Embassadors, That hee and his Countreimen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answer and give account of their actions, as vassals and slaves unto the people of Rome. For if they were indeed at liberty: why might not the Acheans as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedemon? for if the Romans would stand upon their greatness; and intimate as they began, that the liberty of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratifie it: then must the Acheans have recourse unto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without perjury could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answer of Lycurtus, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state upon him; he pronounced more like a Master than a Judge, That if the Acheans would not be ruled by faire meanes, and earne thanks whilst they might; they should be compelled with a mischiefe, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This alteration was in the Parliament of the Acheans, which groned to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet feare prevailed above indignation; and it was permitted unto the Romans to doe as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadors restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very soone after, did make voyd all judgements of death or banishment, that had beene layd by the Acheans, upon any Citizen of Lacedemon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedemon should be suffered to continue a member of the Achean Common-wealth; or, taken from them, and made as it had been an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend upon their owne will, how much or how little any of their Confederates should be suffered enjoy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the love which they bare unto the Achaians, than the power which they had over them.

Into such slavery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Common-wealths whatsoever, bordering upon any part of the Mediterranean Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsell and perswasions of many wise and temperate men among them; they had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans; and, by seeking Patronage, made mere Vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policy so prevail with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath evermore bought revenge at the price of self-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearfull servility.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes very farr from daring to stirre against those, by whom both he and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subjection, had made his implacable enemies) in hearty affection all the Countrey would be his, whensoever he should take Armes, as shortly he was like to doe. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignity soone following. Hee had beene lovingly used at Rome, and heard with great favour in the Senate. There, being confounded with the multitude of objections, whereto his youth, unskilfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer: it was permitted unto him, to reade such briefe notes as hee had received from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne sake, as they then said, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the intreaty of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this favour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his his hatred unto Rome, and breed in him a jealousie of his too forward sonne. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadors from Rome, some bringing one commandment, some another; and some requiring him to fulfill those things, which had beene imposed upon him by their fore-goes. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance: and when he had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge, that he had done things unwillingly, and would be obedient no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadors young Demetrius was conversant: rather perhaps out of simplicity, and for that they made much of him; than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder son of the King, should not succeed unto his father; but that the Diademe should be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by mere favour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perseus, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his younger son, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly mis-constructed all his doings. But ere we proceed unto the bitter fruits of this jealousie; it will not be amisse to speak of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

§. II.

The death of Philopemen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Militarie profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to prove the contrary.

THE Romans wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so preemprory with the Acheans; that they seemed nor unlikely to take part against them, in any controverfie that should be moved. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed unto the Achean Common-wealth, having long beene of a contrary Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Society, with purpose to set up againe an Estate of their owne, severed from communion with any other. This was the device of some that were powerful in their City; who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose; and not overstrongly affected in the businesse; were careful to seeke occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessity of standing out, and of not returning to the Achean League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostility; whereby it was probable that blood should be drawne, and either side so farr exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopemen, then Prator of the Acheans, levied such forces as he could in haste, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Acheans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soon in a readinesse to wait upon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that usually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians, whom he charged, and forced to runne. But whilst his horsemen were too earnest in following the chase; there arrived by chance a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gave new courage unto those that fled. So the Enemies beganne to make head againe: and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopemens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopemen himselfe had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatnesse of his courage would not suffer him to be negligent of their safety, which had so willingly adventured themselves under his conduct. He took upon him to make the Retreat: and suffering his Horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians, whom the reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching over-near to him. But it fell out unhappily, that being cast to ground by a fall off his Horse, and being with all in very weake plight of body, he was unable to get up againe. So the Enemies came upon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleeveth their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farr from being beleeveth, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ranke forth to meet him, him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might satisfie themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertues, and of the singular benefits by him done unto them, especially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliverie. Contrariwise, Dinocrates and his faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would never leave any disgrace, or injury, done to him, unrevenge. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong Vault under ground, that had been made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine laid an heave stone upon the mouth of the Vault. There he had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe unto him, with a cup of poyson, which Philopamen took in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horfmen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a chearfull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seventy yeares old, and weakened with long sicknesse, whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Achaens, vvhen they missed him in their flight, were marvellously offended with themselves, for that they had been more mindefull to preserve their owne lives, than to looke unto the safety of so excellent a Commander. Whilst they were devising what to doe in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched unto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire means would not serve. Lycortas was chosen General of the Army against Messene: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had been partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds upon the ashes of Philopamen that were carried home in solemne pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all of them flaine at his funeral, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Martius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; vvhen, upon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldome absent. He vvould have entemedled in this businesse of Messene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the War against Eumenes, as to entreat him that he would deliver Hannibal, the most spitefull enemy in all the world unto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein unworthy of the Crowne he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Livie thinkes) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him alive to Flaminius. For upon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiers were directed to guard and environ the lodging vvhere Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine having found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had devised some secret fallies under ground to save himselfe from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: vvhich he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to save himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no vvay to escape, nor counsell to resort unto, he tooke the poyson into his hand, vvhich he alvvays preserved for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of adverse fortune; vvhen being ready to swallow downe, he uttered these vvords: I will now (said he) deliver the Romans of that feare which hath so many years possessed them, that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius, over me, vvhen am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall never be numbred among the rest of his heroicall deeds: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how farre the ancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblenesse of their forefathers, as vvhen Pyrrhus invaded them in Italy, and was ready to give them battell as their owne doers, they gave him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poyson:

son; whereas these of a later race, have employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore beene one of their Consuls, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith given, and contrary to the Law of Hospitality, so slaughter or deliver up his own Guest. He then cursing the perion of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortal gods to revenge his infidelity, dranke off the poyson, and dyed.

In this year also (as good Authors have reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being all of them, as great Captains as ever the World had; but not more famous than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, vvho's Tragedy we have now finished, had he beene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one vvho by his authority might have commanded such supplies, as the War vvhich he undertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torn up the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and envious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, vvanting public force to sustaine it, did lastly dissolve it selfe in his owne, and in the Common misery of his Countrey and Common-weale.

Hence it comes, to vvit, from the envie of our equals, and jealousie of our Masters, be they Kings or Common-weales, that there is no profession more unprosperous than that of men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For besides the envie and jealousie of men, the spoyle, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, vvith a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hateful to God, as vvith good reason did Marcus the Marshall of France confesse, That, were not the mercies of God infinite, and vvithout restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoever, this is true, That the victories vvhich are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serve under them, to Fortune, or the cowardise of the Nation against vvhom they serve. For the most of others, vvho's vertues have raised them above the levell of their inferiours, and have surmounted their envie: yet have they beene rewarded in the end, either vvith disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans, we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Livius, L. Aemilius, and this our Scipio, vvhom we have lately buried. Among the Greekes we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that David bequeathed unto his vvictorious Captaine Joab. With this fare Alexander feasted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour invited Artius: vvho, after many other victories, overthrew Attilia of the Hunnes, in the greatest battell for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that ever was stricken in the World; for there fell of those that fought, beside run-awayes, an hundred and fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told unto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Artius, he had cut off his owne right hand vvith his left: for it was not long after, that Maximus (by vvho's perswasion Valentinian slew Artius) murdered the Emperour; vvhich hee never durst attempt, Artius living. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That vvith Artius, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolved, than obscured. The same unworthy destiny, or a farre worse, had Belsarius; vvho's undertakings and vvictories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Justinian: and hee died a blinde beggar. Narses also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgraced by Justin. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well observed in every age since then; to vvit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, vvhich standeth in awe of any one man. And hence have the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed, a Turkish one: That every warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre, than suffer his owne glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bajazet the second dispatch Bassa Armac; Selim, strange Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes vvho vvould to ruine the most of their Fislers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsalvo, vvho drove the French out of Naples; and Ferdinando Cortese, vvho conquered Mexico; were crowned vvith nettles, not vvith Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Born had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines of all Nations have beene paid vvith this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary, it may be said, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great ability in matter of Warre: This I confesse. Yet must it be had vvithall in consideration, that these high places have been given or offered unto very few, as rewards of their military vertue; though many have usurped them, by the helpe and favour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it unregardable, That the Tyrants which have oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which have traitorously cast downe their Masters, and stepped up into their seats; were not all of them good men of Warre: but have used the advantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, have obtained those dignities, which undeservedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those that have purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertues, is farre more in seeming than in deed. Phocas was a Souldier, and by helpe of the Souldiers he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous cruelty, seldom found in any other than Cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that never had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid unto him againe by Heraclius: who tooke from him the imperiall Crowne, unjustly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Leonius laid hold upon the Emperour Iustinus, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge he had left his owne men of Warre, Iustinus, having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippicus commanding the forces of Iustinus, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastasius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surpris'd his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse and needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others have bene repayed with their owne cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruel; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Capitaines to make themselves Kings, have by Gods justice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinary, and perhaps the best way of thriving by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoyle of Enemies, and the liberality of those Princes and Cities, in whose service one hath well deserved. But scarce one of a thousand have prospered by this course. For that observation, made by Salomon, of unthankfulness in this kinde, hath bene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore and wiseman therein, and he delivered the Citie by wisdom: but none remembred this poore man. Great Monarchs are unwilling to pay great thanks, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselves to have bene indebted for great benefits: which the unwider sort of them think to favour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes censured and abused; which proves that weaknesse to be in them indeed, whereof they so gladly shun the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giving thanks; yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Capitaines have made, by enriching themselves with the spoyle of the Enemy, they are very inquisitive to search into it, and to strip the well-deservers out of their gettings: yea most injuriously to rob them of their owne, upon a false supposition: that even they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, have purloyned somewhat from the common Treasurie. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipio's being so lately recited.

In my late soveraignes time, although for the Warres, which for her owne safety and safety she was constrained to undertake, her Majesty had no lesse cause to use the service of Martiall men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many years had: yet according to the duty of that profession, I do not remember that any of hers, the Lord Admirall excepted, her eldest, and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured for any service by them performed. And that her Majesty had many advised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperity of her affaires did well witness, who in all their daies never received dishonour, by the cowardize or infidelity of any Commander by her selfe chosen and employed.

For as all her old Capitaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randol, Drenwrie, Read, Willford, Tyson, Pellam, Colbert, Countess, Bourchier, Burkeley, Bingham, and others:

to those of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Noirice and Vere were the most famous, and who have done as great honour to our Nation (for the means they had) as ever any did: those (I say) with many other brave Colonels, have left behind them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many travels and wounds) nor title nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie, L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.

That her Majesty in the advancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleve other men than her selfe a dis ease unto which many wife Princes, besides her selfe, have bene subject; I say that such a confidence, although it may seem altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in some sort accuse her of weaknesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Advers are so unprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are nerest the person of Princes (which Martiall men seldom are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a profession far more noble than their own, seeing therein they should only mind their Masters of the wrong they did unto others, in giving lesse honor and reward to men of far greater deservings, and of far greater use than themselves.

But his Majesty hath already paid the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieving by Pensions all the poorer sort, hee hath honoured more Martiall men than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred yeers.

He hath given a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable service, as well in the yeere 1588. as at Calix, the Ilands, and in our owne Sea; having first commanded as a Captain, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chief. His Majesty hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldomes; and created Sidney Vicount, Knolles, Ruffell, Cavens, Danvers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their governments and services in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§. III.

Philip making provision for war against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own Subjects. His negotiation with the Bassarne. His cruelty. He suspecteth his son Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slain by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sons death, whom he findeth to have bin innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

Quintius Marius the Roman Embassador, who travelled up and downe, seeking what worke might be found about Greece, had received instruction from the Senate, to use the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedonia. At his returne home, that he might not seeme to have discovered nothing, he told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoever they enjoyed him; yet so, as it might appear, that such his obedience would last no longer, than mere necessity should enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King did wholly tend unto rebellion, about which he was devising. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiousnesse to the Romans, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands; with safety of their honour, if they could finde convenient means; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparent) by what means soever. He was in an ill case: as having bene already vanquished by them; having lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; having subjects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto urged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could devise, against the necessity which he daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gave him cause to suspect that they would doe but bad service against the Romans, he compelled to forsake their dwellings, and removed them all into Emacia. The Cities and Country, whence these were transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more assured against against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, he devised upon alluring the Bastarnæ, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the river of Danubius, to abandon their seat, and come to him with all their multitude: who besides other great rewards, would helpe them to root out the Dardaniens, and take possession of their Country. These were like to doe him notable service against the Romans, being not onely fowt fighting men, but such, as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect unto him alone. The least benefit that could be hoped by their arrivall, must be the utter extirpation of the Dardaniens; a People alwayes troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whensoever they found advantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarnæ, by hope of spoyle, and other incitements, 10 unto a more desperate Expedition, through Ilyria, and the Countries upon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italy it selfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them upon the way: rather it was thought, that the Scordisci, and peradventure some others, through whose Countries they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remove of these Bastarnæ from their own habitations, into the Land of the Dardaniens, upon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious journey unto them, that carried with them their wives and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to passe. And thus hee sought meanes to strengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, 20 nor were knowne unto them; since he was not like to finde assistance from any civill Nation, about the whole compass of the Mediterranean Seas. But these devices were long ere they tooke effect: so as the Bastarnæ came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the trayning of his mento war, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wild people that bordered upon him, and stood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsels and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much agitation their wils to forsake their ancient 30 dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meet for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within words: he having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which also he did unwillingly, being himselfe over-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparent. This evill therefore would soone have beene determined, had not his cruel and vindicative nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just sorrow: but imputed all to traiterous mallice; and accordingly sought revenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deservedly. This increased the hatred of the 40 people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall, when the King in a barbarous and base furie, mistrusting all alike whom hee had injured, thought himselfe unlike to be safe, untill hee should have massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his unmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragically than perhaps he could have desired, gave men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heaven, hee felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary favour which they shewed unto Demetrius, the Kings younger sonne. It may well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissension 50 betwene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius; like as we find it in their Histories. But their notable favour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreme jealousie in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparell, or the unsightly contriving and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were jest at in ordinary discourse and table-talk, Demetrius was fure to be presently on fire, defending and praising them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conversation with their Embassadors, as often as they came, gave his father cause cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counsell held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder son Perseus: who fearing so much lest his brother should step betwene him and the succession, converted wholly unto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirty yeeres old, of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five yeeres, more open and unwarie in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practices, than his free speeches discovered. The jealous head of the King having entertained such suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder sonne, a slight occasion made the fire breake out; that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was wont 10 to be made at certaine times with great solemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus: They cleft in twaine a birch, and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailles, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Armie was to passe. This done, the armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first originall, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the King betwene his two sonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Armie was divided into two parts: which, under the Kings two sonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, using poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this 20 present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did over-earnestly seeke each to get the upper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, untill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himselfe was sorry for this, as it had been some bad preface: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good use. They were of the craftier sort: who, perceiving which way the Kings favour bent, and how all the courtes of Demetrius led unto his owne ruine, addressed their services to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heate of his ambition had carried him 30 beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to observe what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaved himselfe so indiscreetly, that he was taken & well beaten by three or four of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doores. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet hee would leave none of his traine behinde, but forced them all to beare him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet 40 was there such good espiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked up his doores, as if he stood in feare to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondered to see himselfe excluded, and fared very angrily with his brother. But Perseus bidding him be gone as an enemy, and one whose malicious purpose was detected, sent him away with entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the younger unto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, & in effect the same that hath bin here recited, save that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, upon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he should be defended and borne out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because he bore a due respect unto his father, and was sorry to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they fought how to winne unto Demetrius the love of the 50 Macedonians. For prooffe hereof he cited a letter, sent of late from Titus Quinctius to the king himselfe: whereof the contents were, That he had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that hee should yet further doe well to send him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honourable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsell was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should

should wait upon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become servants to this young Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembered them; and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus, that converted matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he fought his innocent brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did beare him, he said that it grew, if not by his owne vertue, at leastwise from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practice, he were more like to lose it wholly, than to increase it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinary Judges. The King pronounced like a father, though a jealous father, That he would conclude nothing upon the excess or error, whatsoever it were, of one day and night, nor upon one houres audience of the matter, but upon better observation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he may seeme to have dealt both justly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gave himself over wholly to Perseus: using so little conference with his younger son, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, he liked neither to have him present, nor neere unto him. Above all, he had especial care, to learne out what had passed between Demetrius and T. Quintus, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom he thought no way interferred in the quarrels between the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. The se brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Timm (whose seale they had counterfeited) unto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the young Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthful and ambitious desires, had caused him to enter into practices unjustifiable, against his elder brother; which yet should never take effect: for that Timm himselfe would not be author, or abettor of any impious device. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King to thinke his son a dangerous Traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if he had pitted the estate of the unhappy Prince, and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discovered unto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to live in safety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reversion unto the Crowne of Macedon. Whatsoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the faithfulness of Didas; who, playing on both hands, offered unto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, and in the meane while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his son to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behovefull to make him away privily, for feare lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a proove sufficient, at least of the Kings delight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the war. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince out of his life. This accursed Minister of his Kings unadvised sentence, first gave payson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Russians, to finish the tragedie: who villainously accomplished their work, by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Anigonius there had not bene found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne blood. The houses of Lyfsmachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or even upon their heeles; by intestine discord and jealousies, grounded on desire of soveraigne rule, or feare of losing it. By the like unaturall hatred, had almost bin cut off the lines of Ptolomee and of Seleucus: which, though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously disordered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that upstart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it selfe to marvellous greatness, in very short space, from the condition of meere slavery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their piety. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples; but is said to have propounded the last of them to his owne children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, where with King Anigonius his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But he was himselfe of an unmercifull nature; and therefore unmeet to be a good perswader unto kindly affection. The murders by him done upon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his blood-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed upon many innocents, both strangers, and subjects of his owne; did now procure vengeance downe from Heaven, that rewarded him with a draught of his owne Poyson. After the death of his sonne, he too late began to examine the crimes that had bene objected; and to weigh them in a more equall ballance. Then found he nothing that could give him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to thinke, that malice had not bin contriver of the whole processe. His only remaining son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which hee tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition, as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no lesse to bee feared than at other times; when he, as having accomplished the most of his desires, left off his usual trouble of minde, and carefulnesse of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times, by those that well understood the difference between a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deepe melancholy; and filled his head with suspicious imaginations; the like whereof he had never bene flow to apprehend. He was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Anigonius, continued fo true to Philip, that he grew thereby hartfull to Perseus: and thus becoming subject unto the same jealous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This Counsellor, when he found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and give ease to the King, untill the truth were known whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philocles and Apelles, (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flamininus, that served as the greatest evidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the businesse: made diligent inquirie after the truth. In this doing, he found one Xychus, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was used by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented unto the King: saying, That this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xychus for feare of torture, uttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himselfe, that he had bene employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesse. No marvel, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he understood that by the unnatural practice of one sonne, he had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous and innocent. He raged exceedingly against himselfe, and withall against the Authors of the mischief. Upon the first newes of this discoverie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italye; Philocles was taken: and either forasmuch as he could not denie it when Xychus confronted him, yeelded himselfe guilty; or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to flye the Countrey: yet not so stout as to adventure himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdome towards Thrace, whilest his father wintred at Demetrius. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his ungracious sonne, tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it upon Anigonius. But his weake body, and excessive griefe of minde, so disabled him in the travell thereto belonging, that ere he could bring his purpose to effect, he was constrained to yeeld to nature. He had reigned about two and forty yeeres: alwaies full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexing himselfe with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most unhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would have desired, of bringing forth together both honour and profit. But for all the evil that befell him, he might thanke his own perverse condition: since his Uncle, King Anigonius, had left unto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was justly punished by feeling the difference between the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which he affected, and the life of a King, whereof he little cared to performe the dutie. His death, even whilest yet it was onely drawing neere, was fore-signified unto Perseus, by Caligene the Physician; who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the sudden, and rooke possession of the Kingdome: which in fine he no lesse improvidently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IV.

How the Bastarnæ fell upon Dardania. The behavior of Perseus in the beginning of his reign. Some wars of the Romans: and how they suffered Masaniſſa cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrell with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Achæans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of warring upon him.

IMMEDIATELY upon the death of Philip, came the Bastarnæ into Thrace: where order had beene taken, long before, both for the free passage, and for the indemnitie of the Country. This compact was friendly observed, as long as no other was knowne than that Philip did live to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his service. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard without, that he took any care what became of the enterprise: then was all daft and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford to good markets unto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarnæ would not be contented with reason, but became their owne carvers. Thus each part having lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blows; and the Bastarnæ had the upper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little use of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some overthrow, received by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to have afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, save thirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seems that by the carelesse using of some victories, they drew losse upon themselves: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their own Country.

As for Perseus, he thought it not expedient, in the noveltie of his reigne, to embroile himselfe in a war so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to prove. Wherefore he wholly gave his minde to the settling of his Estate, which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affairs should require, either for war or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion, he quickly took away the life of Amintor. To win love of his people, he sate personally to heare their causes in judgement, (though herein he was so over-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his vertue of justice to be no better than feined) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Above all, he had care to avoid all necessity of war with Rome: and therefore made it his first work, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend unto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to pitchcase good will of the Greeks, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein so excessively bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder how in few yeers, to his utter ruine, he became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeed the maitring passion, which over-ruled him, and changed him into so many shapcs, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his own. For proove of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busie in warres against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Africa; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to litle effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as ever since the victory) a heavy hand: & suffered Masaniſſa to take from them what he lifted. The Carthaginians, like obedient Vassals to Rome, were affraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Masaniſſa therefore had great advantage over them; and was not ignorant how to use it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoever he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated to leave things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Country of Emporia: and so did he use them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masaniſſa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within a while, restored to the right owners, for love of his Wife Sophonisba, and of Asdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Masaniſſa take from them by force: and by the Romans (to whose judgement the case was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to use all manner of submissive obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this injury, when Masaniſſa came upon them againe, and tooke from them above seventy Townes and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors, they made lamentable complaint unto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make Warre out of their owne Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masaniſſa, invading their Country, howsoever he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was Confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to beare defensive armes against him, but suffered themselves to be eaten up, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they intreated, that either they might have fairer justice; or be suffered to defend their owne by strong hand; or at least, if right must wholly give place to favour, That the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Masaniſſa should be allowed to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gave them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment as they themselves in honour should thinke meet: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Judges; than continually to live in feare, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithall the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping, in hope to move compassion.

Here may we behold the fruits of their envie to that valiant house of the Barchines; of their irresolution in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half penny-worthing in matter of expence, when they had adventured their whole estate in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they servants, even to the servants of those men, whose fathers they have often chased, slain, taken & sold as bondslaves in the streets of Carthage, and in all cities of Africa and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often and so earnestly desired. Only they want peace with Masaniſſa, once their mercenary, and now their master, or rather their tormentor, out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperity as might have beene their owne. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battell at Cannæ; than Hannibal, that wan it was used by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, every man of them, all his private riches upon the Commonwealth; and employed their labours for the publique, without craving recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to set out an Armie into Spain, at what time the enemy lay under their owne walles. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians, having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pitifull behaviour bred peradventure some commiseration; yet their teares may seeme to have beene misstrusted, as proceeding no lesse from envie to the Romans, than from any feeling of their owne calamity. They thought themselves able to fight with Masaniſſa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisuns with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leave as they sought, of defending their owne right by armes: but contrariwise, when without leave obtained, they presumed so farre, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the sonne of Masanissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craved audience. He therefore was called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his comming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his father. He answered, That his Father not being thoroughly aware of any Embassadors thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not given him instructions, how to deale in that business. Onely it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held Councell divers nights, in the Temple of Asculapius: whereupon he himselfe was dispatched away to Rome, there to intreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans, and of his Father, might not be overmuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gave little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Masanissa's sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoever was reasonable; but that it stood not with their justice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those Lands, which by the covenants of the League, were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa, bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian Warre was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for feare of urging them unreasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better usage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was unlikely) that they should be vanquished; he made none other account, than that all Africa round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been unmindfull of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadors; that is, with honourable spies to observe his behaviour. These he entertained kindly at first, untill (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, untill the Bastarnæ were thence gone; though he protested, that he had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done, to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did unto other some. Where he did harm to any; they called it, making War upon their friends: Where he did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subjects, (upon what occasion it is uncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their Governour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian; and therefore unlikely to have presumed so farre, unless either they had been extremely provoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoever it was that bred this courage in them: Perseus did soone allay it, and reclaim them by strong hand. But the Romans took very angrily this presumption of the King; even as if he had invaded some Countrey of their Italian Confederates, and not corrected his owne rebels at home. Faine they would have had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had he humbled once his necke, they could themselves have done the part of Masanissa; though Emmenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That the Conditions of the League between them were such as made it unlawfull, both to his Father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine have reduced the Greeks, and generally all their adherents, even such as had entred into league with them upon equal termes: whom usually they rewarded with a frowne, whenever they presumed to fight themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Acheans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength, made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne carvers, and whose hope of extraordinary favour at Rome caused them them the more willingly to refer their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have chastised the Messenians by War; T. Quinius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authority: yet by his authority he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, even with Lordly threats, when they took upon them to carry any business of importance by their owne power, without standing unto the good grace of the Romans. Who nevertheless upon submission, were apt enough to do them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in usurping the practice of Armes, which belonged only to the Imperial City. In learning this hard lesson, they were such untoward schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed unto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Acheans, refused not only to give them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League between them; but further, with a careless insolencie, rejected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemy might not be supplied from Italy, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, the Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedæmonians, or Corinthians would revolt from the Acheans; they themselves would thinke it a business no way concerning them.

This was presently after the death of Philopamen: at what time it was beleevied, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Acheans had utterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no towne rebelled from the Acheans, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romans with an ill-favoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie,) That they had strictly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained gravity, to have served their owne turnes, they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume unto themselves a Sovereigne power, in directing all matters of Warre, which dissemblingly they would have seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their Confederates: not permitting any of them to make Warre, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against mere strangers; without interposing the authority of the Senate and People of Rome: unless peradventure, sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Roman Arts, howsoever many (for gainfull or timorous respects) would seeme to understand them; yet were generally displeasing unto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, having neither subjects of their owne that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into subjection; for want of more noble argument wherin to practise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flatteringe the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, untill the Warre of Mithridates: being men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratuulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-cravers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and Kingdomes that with over-nice diligence, strove to preserve their Liberties and Lands, from consuming by peice-meale: they were to be devoured whole, and swallowed up at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most unpliant, and wherein many of the Greekes began to have assistance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow, than to breake.

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subjects, could not want good information of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopamen had long since foretold, of the miserable subjection, wherein Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman Patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger, but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves themselves grieved with the present subjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans; yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Country, and would for no ambition, or other servile respect, be flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domestick conspiracies would soone beat an end; when honestie, and love of the Common-weale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this careful provision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly advertised: either because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadors, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traitors (of whom every Citie in Greece had too many) as were men unregarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadors themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Acheans being to send Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callicrates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choice of such a man, one may perceive the advantage, which mischievous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, have against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition, that he chose much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other be of more authority than himselfe therein. Wherefore in stead of well discharging his credence, and alledging what was meetest in justification of his people, he uttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a far more heave hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to look unto the settling of their authority, among his froward Countreymen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken up a custome, to stand upon points of confederacy, and lawes: as if these were principally to be had in regard; any injunction from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Acheans, both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if hee, and some other of his opinion, might have their wills: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columns, or Monuments erected, nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the observance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrary. But it was even the fault of the Romans themselves, that the multitude refused to give ear unto such persuasions. For howsoever in popular Estates, the found of libertie used to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which undertooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming never so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase apace, & they become the prevalent faction. It was therefore strange how the Fathers could so neglect the advancement of those, that fought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman majesty. More wisely, though with seditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greeks: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, upon men otherwise of little account or desert; only for having uttered some brave words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolved to follow this good counsell, in every point; yea to depreesse all those that held with the right, and to set up their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Acheans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present unto all Cities of Greece, requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedemon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates, they advised all men to be such, and and so affected, as he was, in their severall common-weales. With this dispatch, Callicrates returned home a joyfull man: having brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himselfe into the way of preferment. Nevertheless he forbore to vaunt himselfe of his eloquence used in the Senate. Onely he so reported his Embassage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherewith he threatened those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts he obtained to be made Prator of the Acheans: in which Magistracie, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might serve to manifest his ready obsequiousnesse unto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatening termes won many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopefull promises, to assure unto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honestier than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans, some with the Macedonian, and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates wherein they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not sufferable, That a King, no better than their vassall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall afford them just occasion to make warre upon him. Perseus having finished his businesse among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo his Temple at Delphi. He took his Army along with him: yet went, and returned in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worse for his journey, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himselfe; to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatsoever, done by his father, might be buried with his father; since his owne meaning was to hold friendship sincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could have beene pleased better, if he had behaved himselfe after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to have taken such a journey, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recover the love of the Acheans: which his father had so lost, that by a solemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealousie perhaps, no lesse than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoever Philip had by many vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arats, given them cause to abhorre him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, been to them so beneficiall, that not without much ado, and at length, without any generall consent, they resolved to forsake him. Wherefore it was needfull, even for preservation of concord among them, to use all circumspection, that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country towards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of Warre, and when all danger of innovation was past, was uncivill, if not inhumane; as nourishing deadly hatred, without leaving means of reconciliation. And hereof the Acheans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the kingdom of Macedon: yet understanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their masters could not fetch them, ranne daily away in great numbers: exceedingly to the losse of such, as made of their slaves very profitable use. But Perseus tooke hold upon this occasion: as fitly serving to pacifie those, whose enmity faime he would have changed into love. He therefore apprehended all these fugitives, to send them home againe: and wrote unto the Acheans, That as for good will unto them, he had taken paines to restore back their servants, so should they doe very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not run away again. His meaning was readily understood, and his letters kindly accepted by the greater party; being openly rehearsed by the Prator, before the Council. But Callicrates took the matter very angrily; and bade them be advised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Herewithall he tooke upon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Acheans beforehand acquainted with the Warre, that was coming upon Perseus from Rome. Hee told them how Philip had made preparations for the same Warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly, He heard all those matters, which were afterwards alledged by the Romans; the invasion of the Bastarna, upon the Dardanians; the Kings journey against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behaviour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he advised them to expect the event of things, and not over-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answer was made by the Pretors brother: That Callicrates was too earnest in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings Cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well known, that Perseus had renewed his League with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that he had lovingly entertained their Embassadors: This being so: why might not the Acheans, as well as the Ætolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanity required? Nevertheless Callicrates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not over-stiffly gainsay him. Therefore the matter was referred unto further deliberation: and answer made the whilest, That since the King had only sent a letter without an Embassador, they knew not how to resolve. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to do as they thought most reasonable and convenient. But when Perseus herewith not contented, would needs urge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, & deny to give audience: which was proofe sufficient (to one that could understand) of the condition wherein they lived. For harkening to this advice of Callicrates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended War upon the Macedonians; though hitherto no cause of War was given.

§. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodiens, and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemnes his enemies the Rhodiens, with the causes thereof. The unsuccessfull journey of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt upon Eumenes. The brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his device to poison some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree war against him, and send him defiance. Other things concerning the justice of this War.

Eumenes King of Pergamus had beene troubled about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mitridates, his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, and promise. That they, by their authority, would end the business to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings, Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the War himselfe; and brought his Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to give them. After this, being at good leisure; he began to consider how the affaires of Macedon stood under Perseus. His hatred to Perseus, was very great: and therefore he was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now, besides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honours (whereof the Greeks, prodigall in that kind, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to waxe every where stale: whilst Perseus, either by his currying favour, or by the envie borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despite of this indignity, He stirred up the Lycians against the Rhodiens his old friends: and in helping these rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open Warre. But small pleasure found he in these poore and indirect courses of revenge. The Lycians could not be saved by his Patronage, from severe and cruell chastisement, given to them by the Rhodiens. This rendered him contemptible: as like wise, his acts of hostility, little different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loved him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not only continued falling falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Acheans, as too unmeasured, misbecoming them to give; and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which he needed not to have regarded, had he not beene too vainly ambitious) befell him; especially for his being over-serviceable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome; which if fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse hereof, he thought it vaine to strive any longer with bounty; against such an Adversary, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had over-topped him in the generall favour. And therefore he resolved even to overturn the foundations of this popularity, by inducing the Romans utterly to take away from the eyes of men this Idol, the Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainly worshipped. Neither would it prove a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; & perhaps to be recompensed with some piece of the kingdome, as he had bin rewarded, for the like service, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end he made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say; which they knew not before, yet his words were heard with great attention, as if they had contained some strange noveltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarna into Dardania, that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphi, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece, his intermeddling in business of his neighbours, his riches and his great provisions, were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Only he descended unto particulars, having searched into all (as he professed) like unto a Spie. Hee said, that Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse, of his owne money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand Mercenaries for ten yeeres, armes to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as hee should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driven, either to live upon spoyle, or to take from his owne Subjects. Herewithall he prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus, the sonne and successeur of Antiochus the Great, had given his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus, and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loth to utter it plainly) That even the envie to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne marvellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied or justified, (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans, and that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his kingdome, or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify unto the most; saying, that he thought it his duty to forewarne them: since it would be to himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italy making war upon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to beleieve that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, lest he should set upon them in Italy. Nevertheless, forasmuch as they loved not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were given to Eumenes, who had every way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intentment. Now though it were so that he told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his coming, made all seeme greater. For if upon any relation made by their owne Embassadors, or upon tales devised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere he had committed any open act of hostility against them; their injustice and oppression would have beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible, that such a Prince as Eumenes came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselves; who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and securitie? Toward this justification of the warre, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto, their more than usuall curiositie, in concealing what Eumenes had uttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of him, or of some about him, seemes to have disclosed all: when the weariness of the Faithers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearfull apprehension; against which, it behoved their wisdom to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore careless audience was given to the Rhodian Embassadors; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublefome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever beene, and a provoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe conveyed by sea unto Perseus, his bride Lao-dice; which friendly office, as the Macedonian bountifullly requited, so the Romans despihtfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were settling themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassadors came from Rome with strange newes, which gave new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to alien quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished: and that the Lycians were by them assigned unto those of Rhodes, not as meere vassals, but as dependants and associates. For prooofe hereof, they referred themselves unto the commentaries of the ten Embassadors; whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victory against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masaniass, the Ætolians, and all other Kings or Estates that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subjects, had cause to finde themselves agrieved, if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subjects might easily be made their fellows, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rhodians for their good will to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Faithers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, upon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more neerely touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conspired against him, because of his love to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelessly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to finde cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had beene taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to give them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might favour of hostilitie; but that, if his travell in this kinde proved vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falls out contrary to expectation. These bigge words may seeme to have proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast upon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman servitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discovering his too much weaknesse of spirit, unanswerable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore he, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to fortune; which might have been his, had he known how to use it.

Now that this bravery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings own heart, it appears by his daring to adventure soone after, on a practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make warre upon him. It was known that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischievous enemy. So there were appointed three or foure stout ruffians to doe the murder: who placing themselves behind a broken mud wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading up from the Sea to the Temple, did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruised with great stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their work; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conveyed away to the little Ile of Ægina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Antalus took upon him as King, and either rooke or would have taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Siratonica the daughter of king Ariarathes, whom he then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly love, That when the king returned alive home, Antalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, received none other check than, that he should forbear to marie with the Queen, until he were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes never spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, unto the same brother, both his wife and kingdom. As likewise Antalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the king his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especiall favour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to have transferred the kingdom from his brother to him. By such concord of brethren was the kingdom of Pergamus raised and upheld: as might also that of Macedon have been, if Demetrius had lived and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad, when he understood that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saved all from discoverie. But as he was deceived in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived; so was he beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For he had writtento one Praxo, a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he sent about this businesse: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius, a Roman Embassador, then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius, a Citizen of Brundisium: who coming newly from the Court of Macedon, laden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundisium was the ordinary Port for ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gave entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journeying to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitality, he was commended to Perseus, and invited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courties to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his coming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings secrets. The summe of all was, That he must needs doe a turne, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare quality, sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare lest the vertue of this medicine should be tryed upon himselfe. But being once at liberty, he discovered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had never seene before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellowes affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe; and in like sort concerning the attempt upon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such objections were not to be made unto a King, to prove the rightfulnessse of making warre upon him; but rather unto a subject pleading for his life in judgement. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger prooofe (which might have beene easie) than any that we finde by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very temper to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such private offences, it gave him no priviledge: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not lawfully make warre upon Eumenes their confederate, that is, if hee might not send men to waste the kingdom of Pergamus, or to besiege the Townes: might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword, was it lawfull for him to doe it by poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadors douts to denounce it unto him, unless he would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to have beene so confident in the generall favour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances, that if he desired not war, yet he did not fear it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his enemies more calm. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them back, and bade them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearfall of all matters, which they had long bin collecting against him, and wherewith Enmenes had charged him: adding thereto, that he had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Samos with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have stood upon the evidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, wel-beloved, and well friended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage, calling the Romans greedy, proud, insolent, and underminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better than meere spies. Finally, he promised to give them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the league made between them and his father, and renewed by himselfe indeed only for fear: but wished them to defend to more equal conditions: whereupon he, for his part, would advise, as they might also doe for theirs.

Polyb. Legat. 9.

Liv. lib. 33.

In the form of the league between Philip and the Romans, as it is set down by Polybius, we find no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience in the future; excepting those which he immediately performed. But Livie inserts a clause, whereby he was expressly forbidden to make any war abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby every one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entering shortly into league with Rome, did so bind the Kings hands, that he could no more make war abroad, than if he had bin restrained by plain covenant. And thus might that seem an article of the peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would urge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive arms, without their permission: then had Perseus very just reason to find himselfe aggrieved. For since they had allowed his father, without controule, to make war in Thrace, (whilest they themselves were unacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become unlawfull for him to chastise his own Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations he maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as unjust, he ministered occasion unto the Embassadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message, he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdome in three dayes. But either he should have bin lesse vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serve him to undertake the war, he should courageously have managed it, and have fallen to worke immediately, whilest the Enemy was unprepared; not have lost opportunities, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

§. VI.

§. VI.

The Romans solicit the Greeks to joyn with them in the war against Perseus. How the Greeks stood affected in that war. The timorourfulness of Perseus. Martius a Roman Ambassador deduces him with hope of peace. His forces. He takes the field, and wins part of Thessaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what assistants the Romans had in this war. Of Tempe in Thessaly; and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might have had; but lost by his feare. Perseus braves the Romans, fights with them, knows not how to use his victories, sues for peace, and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus having the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Bæotians rebell against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the war against Perseus. They vex the Greeks their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes provision, having heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans beene seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian war, that well they might have beene ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to beleve, that their owne strength was such as would prevaille in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their unreadiness a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greeks and others; who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardness found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to feare, that all of the Greeks or other Eastern people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the dissention betwene their severall Estates; howsoever the generalitie of them were inclined the same way. Nevertheless Embassadors were sent to deale with them all; and to crave their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors used as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtresie: and understood that not only such as made refusall, but even they who might seeme to have granted half unwillingly, were like to heare other manner of words, when once this business was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans: the Acheans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtful, even when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their durie. It is strange, that men could be so earnest to set up the side, whereof they gladly would have seen the ruine. The vulgar sort was every where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded only the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though he judged the victory of Perseus, like to prove hurtfull unto Greece, yet wished he the Romans ill to thrive, that so the Greeks might recover perfect liberty: for his endeavours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appears, that an extraordinary feare, and not only reverence of the Imperiall City, made the Acheans, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be justly imputed unto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himselfe. He had undertaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own Kingdome, but unto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought over-sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speak the enemy faire, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every small thing would serve to terrifie him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leisure upon those which had afflicted him: little cause was there why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition some few Townes, and soliciting all to joyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he fought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit unto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Marius, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more finess in cunning than was usual among the Romans, made shew of inclination to the Kings desire; and gave out such comfortable words, that the King increased, and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Marius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereunto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which 10 they could have made for him, yet the Embassadors, and especially Marius, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied: and advised him to give the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a truce was agreed upon. Thus had Marius his desire; which was to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readinesse, and might have done much, ere the Roman Armie could have bene then in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; hee suffered a most convenient season, of winning upon the enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bin with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation between him 20 and the Romans, whereby he gave men to understand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not only to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodness of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poore helpees. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing upon point of Honour, was no better than mere vanity: his owne safety being the utmost of his ambition. This his fearfulness might seeme excusable, and the blame thereof to appertaine unto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessitie, that was partly 30 their owne: had it not bin his office, who tooke upon him as their Champion, to give such a manly beginning to the warre, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averse from him; and were careful, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might seem to doe against the good liking of the Romans. The Boeotians also, who had entred of late into a strict societie with the Macedonians; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a fort, they yielded themselves as vassals. Neither was Marius contented to accept their submission under a general forme; but caused their severall Townes to make covenant apart, each for it selfe; to 40 the end, that being thus distracted into many little Common-weales, they might not (were they never so desirous to rebel) have such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, under the Citie of Thebes. This work, of separating the Boeotians from Thebes their head, was more than Agessilas could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedaemonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of help from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few brave Citizens, than was the societie with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedaemonians.

Marius brought this to effect, whilst the King sat still, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he returned to the Citie; where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproved it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent, audience was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serve their turne; the Senate being resolved before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirty daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the usual place of giving audience to open open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had onely the short warning of eleven daies, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtesie serve alone to hide the craft of Marius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely meane, both to keepe a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when hee should need it most time.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Roman Consull, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soon, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to have rouzed Perseus, and have made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon, yet was hee content to deliberate a while, Whether it were 10 ly better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans, & to redeem their good will with some part of his Kingdome, that so he might enjoy the rest; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsell prevailed; which also was the wisest, and so would have proved, had it bene stoutly and wisely followed. He now beganne, as if the warre had not begunne untill now, to doe what should have bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendezvous at Cittium, a Towne in Macedon. All being in readinesse, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Cittium. His army 20 he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, whereof about twelve thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of sundry nations, most part Thracians; the rest his owne Macedonians. These he animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestours, the insolencie of the Romans, the goodness of his cause, the greatness of his provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cherefully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their severall abilities. He gave them thanks: but answered, That his own provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with carts, for his 30 engines and munition.

Out of his owne Kingdome he issued forth into Thessaly: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that Countrey, in their journey towards him. Some Townes of Thessaly opened their gates unto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wan by force. Of these last was Myle; a Towne thought impregnable, & therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the inhabitants, who gave contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a fall; which the Townesmen rashly made, and being driven 40 backe, received the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of war was practised here: to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Vetula and Connus (townes of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the frights of Osia, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sycurium, a towne seated on the foot of mount Osia; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consull brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessaly, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from every part of Greece, such aide as the severall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masanissa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many 50 horse; and two and twenty Elephants. Antiochus the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young sonne, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe beganne within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise advised than he had bene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Proton (though Proton was then young, and under Tutors) had businesse of their owne; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian, yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a pretty trick, wherewith M. Lucernus, the Roman Admirall brother, served him, for this his counterfeit good wil. This King had foure and fiftie ships, riding in the haven of Dyrachium, uncertaine to what purpose: all which Lucernus tooke away, after a very kind sort; making shew to beleve, That for none other end to serve the Romans, their good friend Genius had sent thither this fleet. But whatsoever Genius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his Kingdome and himselfe, in the end of this war; by offering, rather than giving, his helpe to Persus.

With none other company than what he brought over the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painfull journey, through the mountainous Countrey of Atthamania, which stood in his way from Epiru; that if Persus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs have taken a great overthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied army, by the river Penew; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Persus. Therefore he resolved, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, until his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Countrey. The land of Thessaly, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as having been freed by them from a more heave yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often used at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poesie) with their Spurres or Branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessaly. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; unless they would make an hungry journey, thorow the countrey of the Dassareians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Persus therefore had no small advantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater he might have had, if by mis-spending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worke; yea to winne upon them (for a while) every yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might have done farre greater things, had he seized upon the streights of Aon, which his father once kept, and defended all the Countrey behinde the mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficulty, must the Romans have eicher travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to bee found; or else have committed their armies, and all things thereto needfull, unto the mercie of Seas that were very dangerous; if they would have sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: upon neither of which courses they once devised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps bee said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must have left on his backe, would have made him unable to defend any places too far from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Etolians, upon whom the Atthamanians depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) even as loone as they met with Persus. The Boetians, how politickly forever Marius had wrought with them, adventured themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrell: what would they have done, if he at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Ilyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after a while began to waver, when they saw things goe better with Persus, than they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any brave performance in the beginning; and increased the number of his well-willers, yea and bought downe with money (as he might have done) some of his enemies, and among them, Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps have bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage over Greece; and to render the liberty, by them given, entire; which otherwife was but imaginary. Such benefit of this war, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason have bin expected expected at first, from greater advantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some river stay their flight; are there compelled by mere desperation to doe such acts, as done, while the battell lasted, would have won the victory: so fell it out with Persus. In seeking to avoid the danger of that warre, whereof he should have fought the honour; he left his friends that would have stood by him, and gave them cause to provide for their owne safety: yet being overtaken by necessitie, he chose rather to set his backe to the mountaines of Tempe, & defend himself with his proper forces; than to be driven into such miserie, as was inevitable, if he gave a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that hee kept his footing in Thessalie, it is hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul having no desire to fight, untill such time as all his forces were arrived, kept within his trenches, & lay still encamped by the River of Penew, about three miles from Larissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter unto a hasty triall. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the field; by waisting the land of the Phereans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignity; he grew bold to adventure even unto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his advantage in horse would make the victory his owne. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, a while together, Persus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his boldnesse much increased; and much more his reputation: to the griefe of those who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell upon them by their enduring these bravadoes. The Towne of Sycorium, where Persus then lay, was twelve miles from the Romans: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which used to take up foure houres of the morning; but he was faine to bring water along with him in cars, that his men might not be both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconveniences, he found out a lodging, seven miles neerer to the enemy: whom he visited the next day by the Sunne rising. His coming at such an unseasonable houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though he brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were unfit to assaile the trenches, yett the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to give checke to his pride. Wherefore hee sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Atalus, and many brave Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to trie their fortune: he himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good retreat) with little losse of his owne. But he discovered his weakenesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile given by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assault their campe; and to that purpose, upon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought unto him by the Captaine, though unfit for: he nevertheless tooke it for found advice, which indeed was timorous and base. To worke warily, and moderate his victory; by which means it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it beene greater, and had he wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would have beene the more, and the bolder. But over-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, even when he had the victory, what else did he, than proclaime unto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the joy of his victory would admit none of these considerations. He had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: loosing of his owne no more than twenty horse and forty foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heavinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemy would set upon it. Eumenes gave counsaile to dislodge by night, and remove to a surer place beyond the River Penem. The Consull, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud termes, to draw upon himselfe a greater calamity. So hee passed the River in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Æoliens were forely blamed for this losse: as if rather a traiciterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were men of especiall marke, had bene observed to be the first which turned their backs: an observation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thebians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they would shunne indignation, or incurre favour, then must they adventure no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne liberty. Thus fared it with the Consull and his Armie. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes error; which how great it was, he nor untill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whither they could never have attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to have routed them whilst they were conveying themselves to the other side of Penem. But it was vaine to tell what might have bene done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their City, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generalls themselves, Prætors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather up the spoiles of them without resistance, as yeelding themselves overcome. With such brave words did the King set out the glory of his action; dividing the spoiles among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honor found. He came neerer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way betweene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Nevertheless he was easily perswaded to use the occasion, which he seemed to have, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent unto the Consull, and offered to yeeld unto the same Conditions, wherein his Father had bene bound to the Romans; if the warre might so take end. It were needlesse here againe to shew the folly of this course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consull no greater power than to grant a truce, whilst Embassadours might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Marius, he had lately found no small discommoditie redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; save that Perseus would yeeld both his Kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to be so resolute in adversitie. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that having received an answer so peremptory, he still persisted, making vaine offers of greater tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himselfe backe to Sycorium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the coming of Misagene the son of Masaniassa, with the aide before mentioned. This distance betweene the King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their harvest: about which busines they ranged over all the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gave him hope to doe some notable exploit: which he attempted, both upon their Campe, and upon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to have fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers; he had a good hand upon them, if he could have withdrawn it, and given over in time. But whilst he strove to force a guard, he was vifited by the Consull; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is divers) in a great battell, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally given to feare danger, even where none was; whereby what losse he felt, will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, save onely Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight unto Comus, hoping to have taken it, it, and so to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the worke too hard, he returned backe unto the Perrabians and others; from whom he won some townes, & among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consull tooke, may seeme not to have belonged unto the Thebians; unlesse, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thebaly.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may thinke it strange, that the Boeotians, whom a Roman Embassadour could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman Armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Navie on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Marius, were more true to Rome, than other petty townes, which by that same distraction of the Boeotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had bene. The causes hereof were to have bene fought among the changes, happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoiling them, that he would have brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreme oppression he could have driven them so farre. Neither was Licinius the Consull undiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is said in general; That in the warre which he made, he cruelly and covetously demeaned himselfe.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hosilius the Consull, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hosilius shewed more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the war against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman warre upon his Kingdome, after that the Consull had sought passage in vaine over certain mountaines, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeed on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consull sent thither with an Armie of foure thousand, and who, by levies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his Armie. But Claudius thinking to have taken Uscana, a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; sallied forth upon him, overthrew him, and chased him so farre, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of Uscana shortly after became Romane: which howsoever it happened, Perseus very soone recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Corys a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epiror, revolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painfull journey into Ætolia: where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Romane faction, yet in his returne home, he tooke in Aperania; and shortly heard good newes, that Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Cleues, one of his Lieutenants. Such successe had the Macedonian war under Hosilius. The same Consull offended much the Greeks, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadours made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadours travelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gave out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might and maine to advance their businesse, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to have accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycurias that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopæmen; & together with him, his son Polybius, who soon after was Generall of the Achaean horse, but more notably by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should have bene; That these were not heartie friends unto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitee than for any love to the common quiet. But since no colour of truth could be found, that might give countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, & give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Æoliens: They demanded hostages; and found some in the Councell that approved the motion: as also among the

the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to have Roman garriſons beſtowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of theſe propoſitions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accuſed not only ſuch as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but alſo the good Patriots; making it no leſſe than a matter of treaſon, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary ſide, there wanted not ſome, who roundly told theſe pick-thankes of their baſe flattery; rating them openly, in ſuch ſort, that one of them hardly eſcaped being ſtoned, even in preſence of the Embaſſadors. Thus was all full of accuſations, and excuſes: among which the Embaſſadors carried themſelves, as men that could beleve none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The beſt was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and publiſhed, to this effect: That it ſhould be free for all men, to reſuſe obedience to any Roman Magiſtrate, impoſing any burthen for the preſent warre, unleſſe it were ſuch, as the Senate had likewiſe thought meete. Of this decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or ſeemed, a good remedy of many inconveniences. But they that ſtanding on privilege hereof, reſuſed to fulfill every commandement, were numbred among the Patriots; which in the end of this warre, proved little better, if not worſe, than to have bene Traitors. The Senate was driven to ſet downe this order; by reaſon of the many & vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magiſtrates, and eſpecially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortenſius. Lucretius was condemned in a great ſum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loved not to have their ſubjects oppreſſed. Hortenſius being ſtill in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embaſſages that came to Rome about this time, either to ſeek redreſſe of injuries, or to offer their ſervices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the leſſer Aſia, there was preſented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a moſt baſe piece of flatterie. Theſe Alabanders brought three hundred horſemen targets, and a crowne of gold, to beſtow upon Jupiter in the Capitol. But having a deſire to gratifie the Romans with ſome exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would be ſingular; and being not able to reach unto any great performance: they built a Temple, unto the Towne Rome, & appointed anniversary games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddeſſe. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Amigonus, Pyolomy, & the like vaine men, that would be thought gods; or at the ſhameleſſe flattery of ſuch as beſtowed upon men, and not the moſt vertuous of men, divine honours; when he ſees a towne of houſes, wherein powerfull men dwell, worſhipped as a goddeſſe; and receiving (without ſceme of the givers, or ſhame of the Preſent) the title of Deitie, at the gift of ſuch a rascal Citie as Alabanda?

Q Martius the Roman Conſul, with extreme difficulty and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Perſeus in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dium quitted by Martius; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill ſucceſſe. Their affairs in hard eſtate. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius ſent Embaſſadour to Martius from the Acheans. Polybius his honeſt wiſedome beneficiall to the Acheans. King Eumenes grows averſe from the Romans. Perſeus negotiates with Antiochus, and Eumenes. His falſe dealing with Gentius King of Illyria; whom he draws into the Roman warre. He ſends Embaſſadours to the Rhodiens; who vainely take upon them to be arbiters betwene him and the Romans. Perſeus loſeth a mightie ſuccour of the Babarnas, by his wretched parsimonie.

After two yeeres of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had bene thought likely to reforme all thoſe Countries, and bring them to what paſſe the Romans deſired; as it did in the end. Perſeus had hitherto the better, and was ſtronger now, than when he lived in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian ſide; his friends, in all parts of Greece, tooke courage daily; and his reputation grew ſuch, as cauſed thoſe that were before wholly Roman, to ſuſpect what the iſſue of the warre might prove, and thereupon to become wiſe for themſelves. Contrariwiſe, Licinius, & Hoſtilius the Conſuls, had one after the

the other ſpent their time in vaine, ſeeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterpriſe of conqueſt, by many loſſes received. The Roman Admiralls had ſo demeaned themſelves, that many Townes, even of the beſt affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Roman ſide; and the Armie much leſſened, not only by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elſe of the Conſul himſelfe (for they laid the blame one upon the other) in licenſing the ſouldiers to depart. Quintus Marius the new Conſul, who ſucceeded unto Hoſtilius, was to amend all this: which nevertheleſſe was more than he knew how to doe; though he brought with him a ſtrong ſupply of men. He began hotly to ſet the warre on foot, which a long time had ſlept. And he began the right way: not ſeeking to force the ſtreights that were ſurely guarded, but taking pains to climb the mountains which were thought able to forbid all paſſage over them, without helpe or need of any cuſtodie. The King heard of his approach; and being uncertaine what way he meant to take, diſtributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit aſcent. But the Conſul proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be diſcovered by the Enemy, or to breake through all oppoſition, or at leaſt wiſe, to fight on as convenient ground, as they ſhould have that lay to ſtop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a ſafe retreat. He ſent before him foure thouſand of his moſt excredit ſouldiers, to diſcover the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles: after which they had fight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their paſſage. They occupied therefore a ſafe peece of ground; and ſent backe word to the Conſul, where they were; intreating him to haſten unto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit diſmayed at his arrivall; but met him, and fought with him, two or three dayes together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little loſſe on either ſide. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gave ſcarcely room to three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the reſt were beholders. In this caſe, it was impoſſible to get forwards: yet a ſhame to returne. Wherefore Marius tooke the onely courſe remaining; and indeed the beſt: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whileſt hee, with the reſt, ſercht a compaſſe about, and fought out wayes that never had bene troden. Herein he found extreme difficultie: which notwithstanding hee overcame. Beſides the troubles commonly incident to ſuch journeyes, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea, where Nature might ſeeme to have intended, that none ſhould be. So ſteepe hee found the deſcent of the mountaines, in this way which he rooke: that of ſeven miles, which they travelled the firſt day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to towle themſelves downe; as not daring to truſt their feet. Neither was this the worſt. For they met with rockes, that ſtood one over another, ſo upright, and cumbersome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddy proſpect, and caſting their governours, made a terrible noiſe, which affrighted the horſes, and bred great confuſion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grievous journey; there was nothing more deſired by the ſouldiers, than that they might be ſuffered to creepe backe againe, the ſame way which they had come. But ſhift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like unto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joyned to the edge of the cliſſe; the other ſuſtained by two long poſtes, ſtained in the ground below. Upon theſe two poſtes, or poles, (which indeed, not being very ſtrong, ſince it was intended that they ſhould be either cut or broken) were ſlained two rafters, answerable in length to the diſtance, betwene the higher and the lower fall: ſo as the end of one bridge might reach to the beginning of another. Theſe were covered with planks and turfe; that they might ſeeme continent with the ground; ſo to make the beaſtes adventurous to goe upon them. If there were a plane of any good extent from the foot of a rocke, to the next downefall; then might the bridge be ſhorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, upon one of theſe; the poſts upholding the frame were cut aſunder; thereby cauſing him to ſinke downe unto the next bridge; whence hee was conveyed in like manner, to the third, and onward ſtill to the verie bottom. Thus went they downe ſliding, ſome on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an even valley. By this it appeares, how thoroughly provided the

Roman:

Romans used to be in their journeyes, of things needfull in all occasions: as also what inestimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conveyance of themselves and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested; staying for Papilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps never, should have overtaken them, if the Enemie had followed, and set upon him from aloft. The third and fourth dayes journeyes were like unto the first: save that custome, and the needesse to their wayes end without meeting enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: since they fought with his men upon the passage three daies together; he lying so nigh, that he might well heere have heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with feare; that he neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consull, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, sat hearkening after the event. Four onely passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Comus; which the Romans were unable to force: the second and third were the same which Marius had attempted in vaine, and another like unto it: the last, by the City of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoever would seeke any other way, must be faine to take such paines as Marius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, save through the valley it selfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood upon the foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the River Helicon becoming there a lake, and called Baphyras, took up the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily have been fortified. Besides all these, there was in the middle of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the spurres of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neere to the very bankes of Peneus, a goodly and deepe river which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had bene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome journey: if Perseus could have seene his owne advantages. For the Roman Army was not onely in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable travaile: but must needs have either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to returne the same way that it came, if the King had made good the freight of Dium. To have returned, and climbed up with their Elephants and carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreme labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemes a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering how the enemy from above their heads, would have beaten upon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that Kingdome had often bene invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe, whence, after that they were arrived, there was no meane to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaird to winne. But the cowardise of Perseus did commend the counsell by them followed, as wise. For hee no sooner heard that the Enemie was come over the mountaines into Tempe; than hee fared like one out of his wits; saying, That hee was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what hee could carry away in haste; and straightwayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, he sent a strait commandment to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though soone after, his master grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner recovered by Divers from under the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so he prevented the damage. Whether Nicias, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his carefull providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their service, was this. Perseus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hastie direction; caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the Sea by their diving, were payed their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witness of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are privie to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would have gone surely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally have behaved himselfe, that no man might believe him to be the author of any unworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacity. He thought it enough to lay the blame upon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consull on the top of the mountaine) & Astlepiodorus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; saying, that they had betrayed unto the Enemy the gates and bars of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it upon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they have sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consull Marius had great cause to rejoyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Army, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He took Dium without resistance; and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a dayes journey, and gotten one towne that yielded, he was compelled by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Thessaly. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessity, well appointed to have holpen him in the warre: but having left behind, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had bene careful to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those wayes onely might come be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was most desirously expected, he forsooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse than foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had bene worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwise it had bene madnesse to put himselfe on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemie, he should be faine to quit it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a badde man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gave off, when it most behooved him to have prosecuted the action.

By understanding the folly, or cowardize of Marius; the King recollected himselfe, understood his owne error, fought to hide it by such poore means as have bene shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the towne of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the River of Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely used, would have bene enough, not onely to have delivered Marius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to have given him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seeke a good end of the warre upon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consull an exceeding hinderance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Onely the towne of Heraclea, standing on the River of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing upon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could, and was not given up for feare. After this, Marius did set a bold face towards Dium; as if he would have taken it againe, and have driven the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to provide for his wintering. He sent the Admirall to make attempt upon the Sea-Towns, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demeirias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundry times adventured forth of the Towne, were still put to the worke. As for the Town it selfe; there was danger in comming neere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the walls, and reached unto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall setting saile from thence, ran along by Enia, and Anigonea, (landing neere to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) until he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes joyined with him, bringing twenty shippes of Warre: and five other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this assistance of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne: which while the Romans were filling up, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence thence, for that it lay not upon the banke. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the town-wall filled up with that earth, & covered with one single row of bricke. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the town, by fapping the walls. To this worke he appointed such as he thought meetest: giving an alarme to the other side of the town, thereby to shadow his attempt. The breach was soone made. But whilst the Romans were shouting for joy, & ordering themselves for the assault: the Capitaines within the towne perceived what was done; and fallying forth unexpected, gave a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch & the wall; of whom they slew about five hundred, and suffered few to escape unwounded. This disaster, and the want of good successe on that part of the town which King Eumenes assailed (a supply in the meane while entring the towne by sea) caused the siegeto breake up. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Capitaine, was gotten before his coming, with such forces, as were not onely sufficient to have defended the Town, if the Admirall had layed siege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoile; or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay dear for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melibæa; whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without worke) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing suddenly over their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all haste, setting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so far was their ability short of their Enterprises; ever since their Confull (whether dastardly, or carelessly) most unlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium. Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Marius perswaded the Rhodians by Agessipolis their Embassador, who came to him at Heraclæa about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably conjecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Marius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet since he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeite. And so were the Rhodians moved to thinke of him; not onely for that the extraordinary courtesie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassadour, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadours of Perseus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did set out their businesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wherein he had lately slaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated: though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Marius his army. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admirall wanting men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Prator, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so unable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger; so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had beene taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had beene driven from some of the Townes which they besieged.

Now although it were so, that Marius in very few of his actions, behaved himselfe like a man of warre: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wisdom, he dealt as a craft-master, with a restless working diligence. This indeed neither proved his sufficiencie, nor comended his honestie: since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neverthelesse, out of envie, vaine glory, or such delight as weak and busie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Countrey. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Hosilinus, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Thessaly; Archo, Eycorias, and other good Patriots among the Acheans, judged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of adversity, whom in prosperity they loved not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree, which passed: That the Acheans should send their whole power into Thessaly, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Armie was levied; and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadours unto Marius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Confull busie in finding passage through Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Armie; and awaited the Confulls leisure till they came to Heraclæa; where finding the time convenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the service of his Nation, wherein soever it should be commanded: Marius took this very kindly; but said, That he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behinde in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Marius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Acheans, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might doe notable service, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthian head of Marius could not allow of such plaine reason. He called unto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide, and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Acheans be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius, musing, and unable to resolve, whether it were for love to the Acheans, that the Consul was so earnest in this businesse; or rather for envie; and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, since himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliver his opinion in the Councell touching this matter; then found he a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as he was sure to incur the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Marius uttered to him in private, would prove no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alledging that he had no need: In this case therefore, he had recourse unto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessity of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, unless by speciall order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred unto the advice of the Confull: by whom it was sure to bee made frustrate. Hereby the Acheans were fayers, of more than an hundred and twenty Talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countreys behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeers imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Marius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in feare lest the fire, which he himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to overway all other passions: it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, have not precisely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Eumenes did not so much as give any helpe to Marius: but coming to have joyned with him, in such friendly manner as hee did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leave behinde him certaine horse of the Gallo-Greeks, being requested to have done it. If this were true; and that his brother Antalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Romans good service: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, & the love to Antalus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gave a willing care to Perseus his desire of accord, for meere desire of gaine. And it might well be, that covetousnesse drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. Howsoever it befall, Perseus caused Eumenes to be sounded, and found him so tractable, that hee was bold to sollicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his advertisements, both to Eumenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect love betwene a King and a free Citie: that the Romans had quarrell a like to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and used the helpe of one against another; that Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Antalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, assailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Egyptian, so long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to surcease from their warre upon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies unto all Kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more neerely toucht; and as he felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answer; he began to offer a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, than Perseus was affraid. Wherefore he promised, for his owne part, That if he might have fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remaine a Neuter therein; and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend unto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give hostages. Perseus liked well to receive the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine have peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samoisbrace: whence it should be delivered unto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samoisbrace was Perseus his owne; and therefore Eumenes thought the money no neerer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, howsoever the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needs he would have part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

After the same manner delt Perseus with King Genius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not stirre. Hereunto Perseus loved not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serve at the last cast, to deliver him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare urge him to prodigality; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents which Genius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both sides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus, to the end that all his Armie might have comfort, by such access of strength to their partie. Presently upon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Genius: who desired the Rhodians, to take upon them, as arbitrators, between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Marius the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors; gave an answer as disdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could devise: so as this vaine glory of the Rhodians was thoroughly chastised; and more thoroughly should have bene, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such use of Genius his friendship, made Perseus without laying out one ounce of silver. Now faine he would have hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus the Macedonian Embassador, who remained with Genius, exhorted him daily to begin the Warre by land and sea, whilest the Romans were unprovided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon ten Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who delivered it to the young King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed up with the seale of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Genius had layed hands upon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessity to make warre with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, under one Clondicus a petty King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gauls, which were

were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarne. These had before-hand made their bargaine; and were to receive present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdome, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Capitaines to come visit him, whom he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to give the souldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy Master, That the Gauls will not stirre one foot further, untill they have gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus hereupon tooke counsell: if to utter his owne opinion before men so wife that they would not contradict him, were to take counsell. He made an invective against the incivillitie and avarice of the Bastarne: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fivethousand horse of them he sayd would be as many as he should need to use; and not so many, that he should need to feare them. It had bene well done, if any of his Counsellors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Armie of them, since without any danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perrabia, into Thessaly: where waisting the Country, and filling themselves with spoyle, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable service, whether they won any victory or not. This, and a great deale more, might have bene alledged, if any man had dared to give advice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had bene with them before, was sent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: upon which followed a great murmur of those many thousands that had bene drawne so far to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now againe, Whether he had brought the money along with him to pay those five thousand, whom the King would entertain. Hereto when it was perceived that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shifting excuses, the Bastarne returned presently towards Danubius, waisting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this crafty messenger to escape unhurt: which was more than he could have well expected.

Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserve his money for the Romans, without diminishing the sum. But of this painfull Office he was very soon discharged by L. Æmilius Paulus the new Consul: who in fifteen daies after his setting forth from Italy, brought the kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed over it a king so foolish and so cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul. His journey. He forceth Perseus to discompe. He will not hazzard battell with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moone. Æmilius his superfluous. The battell of Pydna. Perseus his flight. He forsakes his Kingdome which he yieldeth to Æmilius. Perseus at Samoisbrace. He yieldeth himself to the Roman Admirall, and is sent prisoner to Æmilius.

BY the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity so moved them, that either they decreed that Province to L. Æmilius Paulus, that in this without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betweene him and his fellow Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it upon him, than that so worthy a man was advanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. He refused to propound unto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province; untill by Embassadors, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly understood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being thoroughly knowne to be such, as hath been already told, the Senate appointed a strong supply, not onely to the Consul, but unto the Navie, and likewise to the Army that lay betweene Illyria and Egyptus; from which App. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius sent thither in his place. Æmilius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much gravitie and authoritie. He requested those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this warre, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assitt him with their advice; or else to govern their tongues at home, and not take upon them to give directions by hearesay, and censure by idle reports: for hee told them plainly, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Æmilius, who died valiantly in the Battell of Cannæ, might well be living in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conform themselves the more gladly unto the instructions given by a wise and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Æmilius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his journey; with an especial hope of men, that he should finish the war: though that he should finish it so soon & happily, was more than could have bin hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium: whence, when the wind came faire, he set saile at break of day, and arrived safely at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, having done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Camp, and was there in five dayes more. So are there but five of the fifteen dayes remaining, in which he finished the war.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium; having spared no labour of men and of women to fortifie the banks of Enipeus, where it was soordable in drie weather: so as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibility to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt upon Dium, was lacke of fresh water. For there were ten miles between Dium and Tempe; all the way lying between the Sea shore and the foot of Olympus, without any Brook or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Æmilius found present remedy for this, by digging Wells on the shore; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shore that wants them, though they rise not above the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Marius from taking up his lodging any neerer to the enemy, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the river of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could performe no service of any worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had such means to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did, the passage onward being defended as hath been shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquire was soone found out. There was a narrow passage over Olympus, leading into Perræbia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire journey. Marius either had not been informed hereof, or durst not attempt it; or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the adventure; they fearing lest it would prove such a piece of worke as had beene their march over Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and abilitie to command. He had reformed, even at his first coming, many disorders in the Roman Camp: teaching the souldiers among other good lessons, to be obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had been their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now hee appointed about five thousand men to this enterprize; whereof he committed the charge unto Scipio Æmilianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sons by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a son of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio took with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretians; but his main strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, upon the mountain, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance they might doe notable service against those that should climb up unto them; yet when the darke night took away their aime, they were like to make a bad nights work, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way towards the Fleet; where victuals were provided for their journey: it being noised, that they were to run along the coast of Macedon by sea, and waste the country. All the while that they were passing the mountains (which was about three daies) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set upon Perseus where he lay, rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his main Enterprize, than upon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get over Enipeus. The channell of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a great fall of waters from the mountains, was exceeding deep and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-neer all dry, yet it served not for those that were weightily armed to fight upon. Wherefore Æmilius employed none save his Felices; of whom the Kings light ar-

mature had advantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had rayed on his own bank, did also beat upon the Romans, and gave them to understand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Æmilius persisted as he had begun; & recontinued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might have served to teach the Macedonians, that some greater worke was in hand: since otherwise a good Captaine, as Æmilius was known to be, would not have troubled himselfe with making such bravado's, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looked only unto that which was before his eyes: untill his men, that came running fearfully down the Mountain, brought word into the camp, That the Romans were following at their backs. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse (if not more) amazed than any of the rest. Order was forthwith given to dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Campe was broken up, and a speedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good successe in their journey. It may well be, that they slept untill the Romans came somewhat neer to them; and then taking alarm, when their arrowes and slings could doe little service, were beaten at handie-strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them have beene true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had bin effected by Marius in the yeere fore-going; but was closed up again, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunity.

Perseus was in an extreme doubt what course to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gave advice to man his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: having beene taught by the last yeeres example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But farre worse counsell prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearful deliberations. The King resolved to put all at once to hazard of battell: fearing belike to put himselfe into any one Towne, lest that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not over-carefully relieved. This was even the same that Æmilius, or any invader, should have desired. So a place was chosen neerer unto Pydna, that served well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There he abode the coming of the enemy; who stayed not long behind him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than discretion, had halted away from them, forsaking the Campe that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to give battell immediately: doubting lest otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul, praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Æmilius told him, that he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save only the bare ground whereon they trode. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himselfe unto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battell, gave charge to have the Campe measured out and entrenched behind the Armie; where, in at good leisure, he fell back, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans and the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their own Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, he excused himselfe by the backwardness of the enemy; who advanced no further; but kept upon ground serving ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeere bene Prætor, foretold unto the Consul, and (with his good liking) unto the Armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to be the same night: willing the souldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be knowne long before it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Brass, and Basons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking that thereby they did the Moone great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, when they saw it verified. Contrariwise,

trariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause any alteration in civill affaires, and matters that have small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of observation it is, how superstition captivates the wisdom of the wisest, where the help of true religion is wanting. Æmylius, though he were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moon, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor above the reach of humane understanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with any devout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing 10 his duty to this Moon, and congratulating with sacrifice her deliverie, as soon as she shone out bright again: for which he is commended even by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish devotion, yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for war, was partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainly consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any Sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good luck in the entrailles of the beasts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of victory to Æmylius: but with condition, That he should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greek and partiall, as neerer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had bin better to call upon the new goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or upon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authentically) upon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of military affairs; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrarie to the rules of war.

Now concerning the Battell; Æmylius was thoroughly perswaded, that the king meant to abide it: for that otherwise he would not have stayed at Pydna, when as, a little before, his leisure served to retire whither he listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consull thought that he might wait upon advantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the morning Sun was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hindrance all the forenoon. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Æmylius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder, there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clock in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which whereto neither of the Generals had over-earnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering, which two or three of the Roman souldiers followed into the river, wading after him up to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further bank; whence a couple of Thracians ran into the Water, to draw this horse over to their own side. These fell to blowes, as in a private quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slain. 40 His Countymen seeing this, hasted to revenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had slain him over the river. Hereupon company came in, to help on each part, untill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the event. In fine, each of the Generals placed his men in order of battell, accordingly as the manner of his country, and the Arms wherewith they served, did require. The ground was a flat levell, save that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consull encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King, having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew 50 himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as he pretended, unto Hercules. It is the lesse marvell, that he durst adventure battell, since he had bethought himselfe of such a stratageme, whereby to save his owne person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose unseasonable devotion could be no better than hypocrisie. For he that will pray for a good Harvest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battell, he found it no better than lost; and he, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the fight.

The

The acts of this day, such as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was therewith much affrighted; That the Peligns rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were over-borne, many of them slaine; and the squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out averse to the Romans; and which the Consull beholding, is said to have rent his coat-armour for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his devoyre, the victory might have beene his owne: That which turned the fortune of the battell, was the same which doubtlesse the Consull expected, even from the beginning: the difficultie or almost the impossibilitie of 10 holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilest some of the Romans small battalions pressed hard upon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessarie (if the Macedonians would follow upon those which were put to the worfe) that some files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This coming so to passe, admonished the Consull what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little use, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targetiers; according to the direction given by Æmylius, when he saw the front of the Enemies great battell become unequal, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the unequal resistance which they found. Thus was the use of the Phalanx proved unavailing against many small squadrons, as it had beene formerly in the 20 battell of Cynoscephale: yea, this forme of embattailing was found unserviceable against the other, by reason, that being not every where alike distressed, it would breake of it selfe; though here were little such inconvenience of ground, as had beene at * Cynocephale.

Perseus, when hee saw his battell begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner untouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing the little good service which they had done. As for the poore foote, they were left to the mercy of the Enemie: who slew above twenty thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost in that battell, only some fourescore, or fixscore men at the 30 most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, overtook the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to raying at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traitors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: every one as his own occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For he fell to devising upon whom he might lay the blame of that dayes misfortune, which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At 40 his coming to Pella, he found his Pages and household servants, ready to attend him, as they had beene wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battell, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholy time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their unseasonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischiefe, he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Evander (who had beene employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about 500. Cretians, more for love of his money than of him. To these he 50 gave of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie Talents, though shortly he coozed them of some part thereof; making shew as if he would have redeemed it, but never paying the money. The third day after the battell he came to Amphipolis, where he exhorted the Towne-men to fidelitie, with teares: and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Evander to speake what himselfe would have uttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care to looke vvell to themselves. Upon the first fame of the overthrow; they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them forth under colour of a gainfull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to be rid of the King, they plainly bad Evander to be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which he had there, in certain vessels that he found in the river Strymon, passed over to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to live safe, by privilege of the religious Sanctuary therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the Kingdome fell into the power of Amyllus, within few dayes after his victorie. Pydna, which was neereest at hand, was the last that yeelded. About fixe thousand of the souldiers, that were of sundry Nations, fled out of the battell into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippius, who had kept the passage over Ossa against Marius, with Panauchus, who had bene sent Embassadour to Genius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yeelding themselves, and the Towne of Beraa, whither they had retired out of the battell. With the like message came others from Theffalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereaving the whole body of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Countrey: but opened their gates upon such termes, that the lack of it was granted to the Roman Armie. Amyllus sent abroad into the Countrey, such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: he himselfe marching towards Pella. He found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while he shall have more.

It was soone understood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuary in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Consul confirming the report. He sent these letters by persons of such mean condition; that his case was pitied, for that he wanted the service of better men. The scope of this writing was, to desire favour: which though he begged in termes ill becomming a King, yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retain the Title, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby he craved and obtained, that some might be sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Nevertheless, in this conference, hee was marvellous earnest, that hee might be allowed still to retain the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preserved his Treasure, unto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuary, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him have his desire to live at ease, and to be called King. Yea, it seemes that he had indeed, even from the beginning, a desire to live in this Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the Warre, he was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for * such a paltrie Iland; and for that he offered to lay up the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But he findes it otherwise. They urge him to give place unto necessity, and, without more ado, to yeeld to the discretion and mercy of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Octavius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who assayses, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of imprisonment, he had now already imprisoned himselfe. When all would not serve, a question was moved to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy priviledge of Sanctuary, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quick. The Samothracians, being so now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, That Evander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof unless he can cleere himselfe in judgement, he must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reverence borne to his Majesty, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himselfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this avails, when the minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author: Perseus therefore willet Evander to have consideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Romans.

mans hand; who are like to be presidents and overseers of this judgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, since none other hope remaines, than hope to make good an ill cause; where though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Evander seemes to like well: and either kill himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get payson where with to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had stucke to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him upon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the priviledge of this holy Sanctuary, by murdering Evander therein. Or if the 10 Romans will ascribe so much, who shall dare to gainsay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and event that also lyable to dispute, which preserves him from captivitie; he purpoeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, unto Corys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ship; who easily was persuaded to waite the King thence. With all secrecy the Kings money, as much as could be so conveyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himselfe, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him only * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his sonne, being his * brother by nature) Philip in oily with much ado got out at a window by a rope, and over a mudd wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, he found no Oroandes there: the Cretian had played a Cretian
 20 trick, and was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the shoure: who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. He ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, lest he should be taken, he hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne up and downe making inquirie; till Octavius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should have their lives and libertie, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Iona the Theffalonian, to whom the King had given the custodie of his children, delivered them up to Octavius. Lastly, Perseus himselfe, with his son Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him, rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victory compleat. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein; he might well have brought this war to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing at once, those contrary hopes of saving his Kingdome by arms, and himselfe by flight, he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that have bin wretched by their own default. He was presently sent away to Amyllus; before whom 40 he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the victory over himselfe, as gotten upon one of abject quality, and therefore the lesse to be esteemed. Amyllus used to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a minde, made War upon the Romans. Hereto good answer might have been returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearfull silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul rearmed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercy of the people of Rome. After these good words, being invited to the Consuls Table, and respectively entreated, he was committed prisoner to Quintus.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after four yeers continuance: and such end thereto: withall had the Kingdome of Macedon the glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated unto Rome.

Gentius, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

* Called now
Scutari.

About the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicim the Roman Prætor, who succeeded unto App. Claudius, had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fifteene thousand; with which he was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soone as the money should come, whereof he had received onely ten Talents. But Anicim arrested him on the way, fought with him, overcame him, and drave him into * Scodra. This Towne was very defensible by nature, besides the help of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings preference, made it seeme impossible to be wonne, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicim was confident in his late victory; and therefore presented his Armie before the walls, making countenance to give an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily have defended themselves within the Towne, would needs issue forth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than courageous: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors; by whom, at first, he desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layd violent hands on the Roman Embassadors, to have recourse to such meditation. But he thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison, where they were still alive. Having obtained three dayes respite, he passed up a River, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeed, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caracianus was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. He sent messengers craving access to the Prætor: before whom having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his folly present) he fell downe humbly, and yielded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his kingdom, together with his wife, children, brother, friends, were presently given up. So this war ended in thirty daies: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun, untill Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had bin imprisoned, brought word from Anicim how all had passed.

How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedonia after their victory over Perseus.

Now began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to looke tyrannically upon those that had beene unmanly toward them before, whilst the War with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with a bad grace, saying, that they were sent from Rhodes to make an overture of peace; so far as much as it was thought, that this Warre was no lesse grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and people of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for love of Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (covetous of the charge) to have Warre proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in mourning apparel, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseeching all men, especially the great Ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance, for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene any any whit worse from the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for feare, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would have done, if old M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not uttered a milde sentence, and advertised the Senate, That in decreeing war against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that rather the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedy to ransacke, than any just cause, had moved them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the wars of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any make remained alive, save those that had beene of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many yeeres passed, ere by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the societie of the Romans: a favour which till now they had not esteemed; but thought themselves better without it, as equal friends.

With the like, or greater severitie, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Emylus himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had over them. More than five hundred of the chiefe Citizens in Demetrius were slaine at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with help of the Roman souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul, the redresse was such, as required not the pains of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed unto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, he sealed like a King, with excessive cheere; yet so, that he had all things very cheape in his Campe: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome; some, to give order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate, than was usual in such cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The kingdom of Macedon was set at liberty by Emylus and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans used to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had beene payed unto the King, was lessened by halfe. As for the rest, the Countrey was divided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were sent captive into Italy, with their wives and children, as many as were above fifteene yeeres old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new given by Emylus. Such mischiefes the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leave any inconvenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subjects to Rome, the things done to them could deserve no better name than meere tyranny, yea, and shamelesse perjury; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation seeme of no validitie. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greekes, called before them all such men of note, from every quarter, as had any way discovered an unserviceable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no subjects, yet wanted there not colour, for using them as traitors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded, for having been openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriots were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Achaens these Embassadors were to deale more formally: not so much because that Common-wealth was strong, (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to prove untractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of signe, by letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achaens could be suspiciously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callistarches, nor any of his adherents, had bin employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their service to the Romans; but onely such as were the best Patriots. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to use the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for feare of Rome, the season served fitly to ranke the Achaens with the rest.

And

And hereto Callierates was very urgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were now taken, he and his fellows should be made to pay for their mischievous devices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadors came among the Acheans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callierates had before instructed him. He said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perseus. This being so, he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence given, he would name unto them. After sentence given (cried out the whole assembly) what justice were this? Name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well doe, we will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their Armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, then should I likewise have beene friend to Perseus: whereof if any man can accuse me, I shall thoroughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Upon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that even so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not untill he had cited above a thousand; willing them to appeare and answer before the Senate. This might even be termed the captivitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause, than their love unto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure that vertue, and regard of the publike liberty, should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Acheans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondered, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since honestie had bin thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Acheans, nor yet held to be offenders. But in stead of better answer, it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countie, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any solicitation of the Acheans, who never ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, prevail at all; untill after seventene yeeres, fewer than thirty of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian, was one. All the rest were either dead in prison, or having made offer to escape, whether upon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of Jayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done upon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserve the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiers, gave order, That the whole Country of Epyrus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Æmylius with mischievous subtiltie. Having taken leave of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to use the liberty bestowed upon them by the people of Rome; hee sent unto the Epirots for ten of the principal men out of every Citie. These he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had; and sent along with them, into every of their Townes, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gave secret instructions to the Capitaines, that upon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, every one the Towne wherein he was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoyled by the Roman souldiers; and besides other acts of hostilitie in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaves. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserved punishment, as having favoured Perseus. But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence; yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had beene already sent into Italy, there to receive their due; and since this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present in good obedience, but had even in this warre done good service to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleieve it, had any one Writer delivered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all, it is the lesse marvellous, that God was pleased to make Æmylius childelesse, even in the glory of his triumph, how great soever otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greeks and Macedonians.

ans. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad, it will appeare by the efficacy of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we speake, we must say somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

§. XI.

The War of Antiochus upon Egypt brought to end by the Roman Embassadours.

A Niochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his reigne and life. He died the fixe and thirtieth yeere after he had worne a Crowne, and in the seventeenth or eighteenth of Protonie Epiphanes: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Justine) of Jupiter. He left behind him three sons, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had given in marriage to Protonie Epiphanes King of Egypt. Seleucus, the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sons, reigned in Syria twelve yeeres, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpicius: though Iosephus give him but seven. A Prince, who as he was sloathfull by nature, so the great losse which his father Antiochus had received, tooke from him the means of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeeres before his birth, Daniel gave this judgement, Et stabit in loco ejus vilissimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) shall start up a vile person, unworthy the honour of a King. Under this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: *What time as the holy City was inhabited with all Peace, because of the godlinesse of Onias the Priest, it came to passe, that even the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon of Benjamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliadorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successeur Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the reigne of this King, that the books of the Maccabees take beginning. Which books seem not to be delivered by one and the same hand. For the first book, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his successeurs, til the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother & successeur of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabæus (who died in the hundred threescore & seventeenth yeere of the Greeks in Syria) that first book treateth. The Author of the second book, although he take the storie somewhat further off, by way of a Proæme, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeer of the Grecian reign, and with the death of Nicanor, slain by Judas: remembering in the fourth Chapter the practice of Jafon the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successeur, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Jansenius, and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius, King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greeks, Jonathan the brother and successeur of Judas, remembereth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Namenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereto Iosephus adds, that the name of the Macedonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and so were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her claws.*

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succceeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seven and thirtieth yeer of the Greeks in Syria. He was the second son of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his kingdom by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also he usurped from his brothers son.

Protonie Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had been about seven yeeres King of Egypt.

Protonie Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt foure and twenty yeers, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdome between them, whilst he was a child. But they found such other businesse, ere long, with the Romans, as made them give over their unjust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gave with his daughter in marriage, unto this Ptolomie, the Provinces of Cælosyria, Phœnicie, and Judea, which he had won by his victory over Scopas, that was generall of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Nevertheless, Ptolomie adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater securitie. He left behind him two sonnes; this Ptolomie Philometor, and Ptolomie Physcon, with a daughter Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom she was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolomie Philometor, so called (that is, the lover of his mother) by a bitter nick-name, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subjects, and was like to be chafed out of his Kingdome, his younger brother being set up against him. Physcon having a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himself in Memphis, craving succour of King Antiochus his Uncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who under colour to take upon him the protection of the young Prince, fought by all means possible to possess himselfe of that Kingdome. He sent Apollonius the sonne of Mnefthem Embassadour into Egypt, and under colour to assist the Kings Coronation, he gave him instructions to perswade the governors of the young King Philometor, to deliver the king his Nephew, with the principall places of that Kingdome, into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephewes safety and well doing. And the better to answer all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came he alongst the coast of Syria to Jappe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Jerusalem; where, by Jason the Priest, (a Chaplin fit for such a Patron) he was with all pompe and solemnitie received into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Selencus, the brother and predecessor of Epiphanes, that impious Traytor Simon of the Tribe of Benjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Governour of Cælosyria and Phœnicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heaven; the said Apollonius being stricken by the Angell of God, and recovering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like ungodly practices. Presently upon the death of Selencus, this Jason, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtain the Priesthood for himselfe, offered unto the King three hundred and threescore talents of silver, with other repts and summes of money. So he got his desire, though he no long enjoyed it.

This naughty dealing of Jason, and his being over-reached by another in the same kind, calls to mind a by-word taken up among the Achaens, when as that mischievous Callicrates, who had bene too hard for all worthy and vertuous men, was beaten at his own weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

One fire than other burnes more forcibly,
One Wolfe than other Wolves does bite more sore,
One Hawke than other Hawkes more swift does flye,
So one most mischievous of men before,
Callicrates false knave as knave might be,
Met with Metalcidas more false than he.

And even thus fell it out with Jason: who within three yeares after was betrayed, and overbitten by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Jason thereupon being forced to flye from Jerusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Jerusalem Antiochus marched into Phœnicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty array of land-forces, He went about to reigne over Egypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realmes, and entered Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Navie, and moved warre against Ptolomeus King of Egypt; but Ptolomeus was afraid of him, and fled, and many were wounded to death. He won many strong Cities, and tooke away the spoyle of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled

Prophecie of Daniel. He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Provinces, and he shall doe that which his Fathers have not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Never indeed had any of the Kings of Syria to great a victorie over the Egyptians, nor took from them so great riches. For he gave a notable overthrow to the Captaines of Ptolomie, between Pellusum and the hill Cassius, after which he entred and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, hee turned againe, and went up towards Israel and Jerusalem with a mighty people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and took away the golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the Pwring Vessels, and the Bolles, and the golden Basons, and the Vails, and the Crowns, and the golden Apparell. He took also the Silver, and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian war that Antiochus took in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Cælosyria, justifying his title by the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffly averring, that this Province had not bin assigned over to the Egyptians, or given in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approve his right unto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achaens, Rhodian, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, pressed him, by severall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolomies, then should the war be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw, that it was an hard piece of work to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine war, than by the terror of his arms, threatening destruction unto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leaving the Ptolomies in very weak estate, the younger almost ruined by his invasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weak soever these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leave them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Jerusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Jerusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch, and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thracians and others in those parts, who had been given, as it were, by way of dowrie, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochus. For Governour of Syria in his absence he left one Andronicus, a man of great authoritie about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Jason out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an In-come, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adjoining. This he did, as it seemeth, to advance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Sistratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Jason) had certain knowledge, being moved with zeale, and detesting the sacrilege of Menelaus, he reproved him for it; and fearing his revenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoining as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweet Springs, banqueting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lust & other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claim privilege, from the holinesse of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Only I say for mine owne opinion, that the inconvenience is farre lesse, to hold this booke as Apocryphal, than to judge this fearfull thift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not save the life of the poore old man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to slay Onias. So when he came to Onias, hee counsellled him craftily, giving him his right hand with an oath, and perswaded him to come out of the Sanctuary; so he slew him incontinently without any regard of rightconnesse. when complaint was made to Antiochus after his return out of Cilicia, He took away Andronicus his garment of purple, and rent his cloaths; & commanded him to be led through out the Citie; and in the same place where he had committed the wickednesse against Onias, he was slaine as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I should have thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Justice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolomie, a Traytor to Ptolomie Philometor, and his brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his own outrageous will, and not by any regard of justice: since he revenged the death of Onias, yet slew those that were in the same cause with Onias; who, had they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should have bin heard as innocent. By reason of such his unsteadinesse, this King was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, Mad, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were there seen throughout all the Citie of Jerusalem, fortie daies long, horsemen running in the aire with robes of gold, and as bands of Spear-men, and as troupes of Horsemen set in array, encounting and coursing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of God, all Histories have delivered us, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian, a star in the form of a sword appeared in the Heavens directly over the Citie, after which there followed a slaughter like unto this of Evens directly over the Citie, though far greater. In the Cymbrian wars, Plinie tells us, that Armies were seen fighting in the ayre from the morning till the evening.

In the time of Pope John the eleventh, a fountaine powred out bloud in stead of water, in or neare the Citie of Genoa; soon after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signs, Vipera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to me most memorable, because the most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperor Nero, the Off-spring of the Caesars, as well naturall as adopted, tooke end; whereof this notable signe gave warning.

Sueton Galba.

When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white hen, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: of the Hen came a faire encrease of white Poultrie; and from the little Branch there sprang up in time a Grove of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all triumphs, the Conquerors did use to carrie in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; & after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were observed, when they hapned to wither, to foreshew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last year of Nero, all the broods of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Caesars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Jewes did not thinke such strange signs to be unworthy of regard; it appears by their calling upon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolomie being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Uncle, thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by armes. Physcon had not yet forgotten the terrour of the former siege: the Alexandrines though they loved not Philometor, yet loved they worse to live in scarcitye of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) since no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helps, and above all these, the loving disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor, in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein he stood of his Uncle. For though Antiochus was gone out of Egypt with his Armie; yet had he left behind him a strong Garrison in Pelusium; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt; to his owne own use. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his Nephew, and a meaning to subject his younger brother unto him, which he gave in answer to all Embassadors; yet he now prepared to make a sharpe warre upon them both. And to this end he presently furnished and sent out his Navie towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Cælosyria, ready to enter Egypt the 10 Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadors sent from Ptolomie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That he would rather be pleased to signifie what he required to have done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That he would neither call backe his Fleet, nor withdraw his Armie, upon any other condition, than that Ptolomie should surrender into his hands, together with the Citie of Pelusium, the whole Territorie thereto belonging: and that he should also abandon and leave unto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that he had unto either of them, for ever. For answer unto these demands, he set downe a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entered Nilus, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolomie in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Memphis, and all about it, received Antiochus, being unable to resist him. The King having now no stop in his way to Alexandria, passed on thitherwards by easie journeyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a civill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the iust cause. Yet they gave signification, that it would be much displeasing unto them, to have the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightful owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loath to provoke Antiochus too farre. Nevertheless, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in need of helpe against their Uncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to be expected, that not only the Romans, but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had beene sustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italie lying waste, had neither corn nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian had Aratus laid the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Achaens attained. And by the like helpe had Rhodes beene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolomies had done for sundrie people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requittall: but with continuance of futable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhodian and Achaen, who seemed most able to give it effectually. To the Romans Physcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeere since: but their Embassadors lay still in Rome. Of the Achaens they desired in particular, that Lycortas the brave warrior might be sent unto them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius, Generall of the Horse. Hereunto the Achaens readily consented: and would immediately have made performance, if Callicrates had 30 not interposed his mischievous art. He, whether seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather envying those noble Captaines whose service the Kings desired; withstood the common voice; which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be ayding unto the Ptolomies. For it was not now (he said) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld unto the Romans what helpe soever should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, he, with those of his faction, obtinately persisted: terrefying others with big words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius Zzzzz 2 the

the late Confull had signified unto him, that the Romans were past all need of help: adding further, that a thousand foot and two hundred horse, might well be spared to the aid of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any service to the Romans; for as much as the Achaens could without trouble, raise thirty or forty thousand Souldiers. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken by the violence of Callierates. For when it was thought that the Decree should have passed; he brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Achaens were desired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour, as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadors to set Egypt in peace. This was an advice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadors to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse elsewhere, with such milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely that the Achaens should doe any good in the same kinde. Yet Polibius and his friends durst not gaine-say the Roman Council, which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much distresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassador, sent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could have done.

Audience had beene lately given by the Senate, unto those Embassadors of Physcon and Cleopatra: which having stayed more than a whole yeare in the Citie, brought nothing of their businesse to effect until now. The Embassadors delivered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no lesse than his brother and Sister.

In this ambassage of Protonie, now requesting help from Rome, appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had beene before three or foure yeares last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which began with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Eumenes, or Lenaus (upon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the government of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not only he determined to set upon Antiochus for Celestria, but would have interposed himselfe betwene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embassador was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subjects, to live under protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by attonement with his brother and subjects, he might have seemed to stand in noneed of such protection, he hath remaining none other help whereby to save both his kingdom & life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister, shewed it selfe, even in the habit of those Embassadors. They were poorly clad; the haire of their heads and beards overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands branches of Olive. Thus they entered into the Senate, and there fell groveling and prostrate upon the floore. Their garments were not so mean and mournfull, nor their looks and Countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other far more lamentable. For having told in what danger their King and Countrey stood; they made a pittifull and grievous complaint unto the Senate, beseeching them to have compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly & faithfull to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore favoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authoritie, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadors, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Armie out of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or used any delay; then should Protonie and Cleopatra be shortly driven out of their Realms, and make repaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonour to the Senate & people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes; they had not vouchsafed to relieve them.

The Lords of the Senate moved with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimus and A. Hosilius, as Embassadors to determine and end the war betwene those Kings. In commission they had first to find King Protonie, and then Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that unlesse they surceased, and gave over Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or using delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadors, tooke their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie over Lusine, some forty miles from Alexandria. So neer was he to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadors met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius; but Popilius filled it with a Roll of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and having a little while considered of the businesse, he told Popilius, That he would advise with his friends, and then give the Embassadors their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinarie blunt manner of speech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moved out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after he had stayed and pawed a while, I will be content (quoth hee) to doe whatsoever the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gave unto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition; even in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling every particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Jerusalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather bin historified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadors, they stayed awhile, and settled the kingdom of Egypt, leaving it unto the elder brother, and appointed the younger to reign over Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they felt, as it had beene, in the power of the Egyptian, having first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already given an overthrow to the Egyptian ships.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadful to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Mafanissa, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instabilitie of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the worke.

BY this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceive how terrible the Romans were grown, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had bin well contented, a year before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, & to give good language to the Achaens and Asolians, when he went Embassador to those people of Greece, that were of far lesse power than the King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadors which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse used any menacing termes, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratefully acknowledge the victorie over Perseus, and to crave help or countenance of the Senate against the Gallo-greeks, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and lovingly entertained by most of the Senators: who had him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers kingdom for himselfe; for it should surely be given him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that he either approved, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soon reclaimed by the faithfull counsell of Serapius a Physician; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keep his brother upright. So, when he came into the Senate, he delivered the errand about which he had bin sent; recounting his own services done to the Romans in the late war, * where withall he forgot not to make of his brother as good * Libani

mention as he could: and finally requested; That the Townes of Enus and Maronea might be bestowed upon himselfe. * By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to crave another day of audience for that business alone. Wherefore to make him understand how gracious he was, they not only granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gave unto him (as was his custome to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they used singular magnificence. Neverthelesse Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning, but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst he was yet in Italie, they gave order for the libertrie of Enus and Maronea: thereby making uneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, revoke. And as for the Gallo-greekes, which were about to invade the kingdome of Per-gamm; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthe of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might well blame the follie of his second voyage thither, for this necessitie of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, he had layd open unto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne doores. No sooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to use him as an enemy, that came to visit them in love: neither could they, in so doing, have avoided the note of singular inconstancie: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, so as they deemed it would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much farther complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had bene at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcomed after a better fashion. He had learned to behave himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entering into the Senate, he lay down, and kissed the threshold, called the Fathers his gods and saviours: as also he used to wear a Cap, after the manner of slaves newly manumitted, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. He was indeed naturally a slave, and one that by such abject flattery kept himselfe safe; though doing otherwise greater mischief than any wherewith Perseus had bene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend unto the Senate the care of his son Nicomede, whom he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made, to have some Towns added to his kingdom: whereto, because the grant would have bin unjust, he received a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his son; it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately dobe to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gave unto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But above all other Kings, Masaniassa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controversies they gave judgement on his side: and whereas he had invaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but unable to win the Towns; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to him, for having hindered him of his due so long. Now indeed had Rome good leasure to devise upon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masaniassa himselfe was shortly by them rooted up. But hereof the old King never dreamed. He sent to Rome one of his sons, to congratulate the victorie over Perseus; and offered to come thither himselfe, there to sacrifice for joy unto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good will was lovingly accepted; his son rewarded; and he entertained to stay at home.

Cotys the Thracian sent Embassadors to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him given to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to intreat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at libertie, for convenient ranfome. His excuse was not taken; since hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Perseus, by giving hostages without necessitie: Yet was his sonne given backe to him ranfome free; with admonition, to carry himselfe better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay betwene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire termes.

Romans

As for those unhappie Kings Perseus and Gentius, they were led through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Emilius and Anicius. Perseus had often made suit to Emilius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but he still received one scornfull answer, That it lay in his owne power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himselfe. And surely, had he not hoped for greater mercie than he found, he would rather have sought his death in Macedon, than have bin beholding to the courtserie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemencie, whereof Emilius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that he, and his fellow King, had bene led in chaires through the streets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot up towards the Capitol, there to doe sacrifice, he should command the captives to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were overcome, might be both together at the utmost. This last sentence of death was remitted unto Perseus: yet so, that he had little joy of his life; but either famished himselfe, or (for it is diversly reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of sleepe. Of his sons, two died; it is uncertaine how. The youngest called Alexander (only in name like unto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, unto the fortunes of the Great) became a Joyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In such poverie ended the Royall House of Macedon: and it ended on the sudden; though some eight-score years after the death of that Monarch, unto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had knowne it before, that his owne son should one day be compelled to eame his living by handie-work, in a painfull Occupation; it is like, that he would not, as in a wantonnesse of Sovereigntie, have commanded those poor men to be slain, which had recovered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diving. He would rather have bene very gentle, and would have considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most undertraden wretches, are all subject unto the One high Power, governing all alike with absolute command. But such is our unhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsel, Do as ye would be done unto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicity; we entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truly:

—Et qui nolunt occidere quinquam
Possunt volunt.

Juv. sat. 2.

Even they that have no murderous will,
Would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, have a vaine desire of abilitie to doe evil without controll: which is a dangerous temptation unto the performance. God, who best can judge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that use it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not that a Prince, by racking his Sovereigne authoritie to the utmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to root up all his progenie? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other neerenesse in blood, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that governes one, the most unworthie of his whole house, yet reigning over all: the untimely death of many Princes which could not humble themselves to such flatterie; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Hereunto may be added, That the heire of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traitorously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemy, to exercise the same upon the Line of that unhappie King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subject;

subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie gods of Kingdomes, nor to authorize by wicked precedents, the evil that may fall on their own posteritie: so do they necessarily make us understand, how happie that COUNTRY is, which hath obtained a King able to conceive and teach, That "God is the forest and sharpest Schoolemaster that can be devised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controulement to turne it upside-downe at their pleasure.

Chap. 3. §. 5.

Now concerning the Triumph of L. Aemilius Paulus, it was in all points like unto that of T. Quinctius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was led along therein, as part of his owne spoiles; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thenceforth, untill the civill wars which followed upon the death of Julius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it self with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have bin hindred by the souldiers; who grudged at their Generall, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate over-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by severe exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victorie as men could give. Nevertheless, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sons, that were not given in adoption: of which, the one dyed five dayes before the Triumph; the other three dayes after it. This losse he bore wifely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the joy of his victorie was required with his owne private calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About the same time, Octavius the Admirall, who had brought Persus out of Sarmathrace: and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their severall triumphs. The glorie of which magnificent spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enow to say unto Rome, Sume superbiām, Take upon thee the Majestie that thy deserts have purchased.

BY this which we have already set downe, is scene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectors thought, that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field, having rooted up, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beautie it had; the storms of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have bin the subject of those ancient Histories, which have bin preserved, and yet remaine among us; and withall of so many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerful Princes, and other mightie men have complained against infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these undertakings, these great Lords of the world have beene stirred up, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth up the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good advice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proves. And certainly, as Fame hath often been dangerous to the living, so is it to the dead of no use at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreme ill bargaine of buying this lasting discourte, understood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather have wished, to have stolne out of the world without noyle, than to be put in minde, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and crueltie: by giving in spoyle the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by having emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them again with so many and so variable sorts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath beene no State fearefull in the East, but that of the Turk; nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his wings far over his nest, but the Spaniards; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moores out of Granado, have made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, &c. by the many kingdoms which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoised by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as have beene spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defensive war, and in diversions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeares, or three at the most, they may not only be perswaded to live in peace, but all their swelling and overflowing streames may be brought back into their naturall channels and old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one seeking to root out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof; the one to joyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spain.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundlesse ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath beene already said; That the Kings and Princes of the world have alwaies laid before them the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are alwaies transported with the glorie of the one, but they never minde the miserie of the other, till they finde the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, upon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the world, without speaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is beloved; God, which hath made him, and loves him, is alwaies deferred. I have considered (saith Salomon) all the works that are under the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie and vexation of spirit: but who beleeves it till Death tells it us? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the first, made him enjoyne his sonne Philip to restore Navarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that justice should be done upon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tels the proud and insolent, that they are but Abjects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them cry, complaine, and repent; yea, even to hate their forpast happiness. He takes the account of the rich, and proves him a beggar; a naked beggar, which hath interest in nothing, but in the gravell that fills his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautifull, and makes them see therein their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just, and mightie Death! whom none could advise, thou hast perswaded, what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the farre stretched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic jacet.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calls it selfe, The first part of the General Historie of the world, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I also intended, and have hewne out; besides many other discouragements, perswading my silence; to whom it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose unspeakable and never enough lamented losse hath taught me to say with Job, Versa est in Luthum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

FINIS.

TO THE READER.

The use of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Histories, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall: since they cannot, like Annales, yeerely set downe all occurrences not coherent. This here following, may serve as an Index to the present part of this worke, pointing unto the severall matters, that having fallen out at one time, are far dis-joined in the relation. Certainly it is not perfect, neither doe I thinke that any can bee. For howsoever the yeeres of the first Patriarchs may seem to have beene well neere complete, yet in the reignes of the Kings of Juda and Israel, we finde many fractions, and the last yeer, or yeeres of one King reckoned also as the formost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in many other, though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the divers and imperfect forms of the yeere, which were in use among sundry nations, causing the ^{Sabbat.} Sum- ^{chap 3 s. 6.} mer months, in proceſſe of some ages, to fall into the winter; and so breeding extreme confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chooſe out of so many, and so utterly disagreeing computations, as have already gotten authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alledged, in excuse of such error, as a more intentive and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may serve to free the booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane judgement) from any notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to suffice. The booke indeed will need it, even in that regard; not onely for some errors of the presse, in the numbring of yeeres, but for some hastie mis-reckonings of mine owne, which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne ease.

The titles over the Columns, have reference to that which followes under them, as will readily be conceived. Where two titles, or more, are over the head, as ^{Rome} ^{Nabonassar} there doe the numbers underneath proportionably answer, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example, The walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319. yeere from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be understood, That Jehosaphat began his reigne in the 3774. of the Julian Era, in the 3092. of the world, and in the 99. yeere of the Temple. This needs not more illustration, nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To avoid prolixity, I have forborne to insert those yeeres, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident, as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings reigne; some change of Governement; some battaile fought, or the like. So of the 13. yeeres wherein Syllivius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note onely the first, that is, omitting all betwixt the 4. of Jehosaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17. wherein Syllivius Aventinus succeeded, and wherein Jehoram first reigned with Jehosaphat his father. For I thought it vaine to have filled up a page with 12. lines of idle cyphers, numbring forth 2. 3. 4. 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Aventinus, and the 17. of Jehosaphat. In setting downe the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one, what place hee held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fift, seventh, or so forth, in ranke of those that reigned in his countrey, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeer of his reigne; at the end or foot of the name (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of yeeres in which he reigned, in the spaces following underneath, are those yeeres of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeere of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name; there it is to bee understood, that the same yeere belonged not onely to the King then beginning, but unto some one, or more of his foregoers: as the first yeere of Jehoram King of Israel, was the same with the second of his brother Ahaziah, and the 22. of his father Ahab. So where two or three names are found in one space, as in the 3077. yeere of the world, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri, it is meant that every one of them reigned in some part of the same yeere, which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omri. Particularly, under the reignes of the Egyptian Kings are set downe the yeeres of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise otherwhiles, the day, the month, upon which Nabonassars yeere began, which, how it varied from other yeeres, may be found in the place last above cited.

To the Reader.

Concerning the Æra, or account of yeeres, from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads from Rome built, from Nabonassar, and the likes as much as was thought convenient hath bin said, where due place was, in the booke it selfe: so as it remaineth onely to note, that under the title of Olympiads it set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeer of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his reigne in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first yeer thereof.

Now, for that the yeeres of the world, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and others, had not beginning in one moneth, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their severall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their severall Columes, opposing parts of the one yeere to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overting parts of one straight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared, as more trouble some than usefull, since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will only be needfull to observe that hitherto the Æra of the Olympiads be 24. yeeres older than that of Rome, and 29. than that of Nabonassar: yet the reigne of some king may have begun at such a time of the yeere as did not suite with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily finde my meaning: the vulgar will not finde the difficulty. One familiar example will easily suffice. Elizabeth began her reigne the 17. of November, in the yeere of our Lord 1558. She was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it up, threw downe Images, and reformed 20 many things in religion, all in her first yeere, yet not all in that yeere 1558. but the greater part in the yeer following: whether we begin with the first of January, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwise found in this Table, and so, as the difference is never of a whole yeere.

The Julian Period, which I have placed as the greater number, over the yeeres of the world, was delivered by that honourable, and excellently learned Joseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Julian yeeres, now in use among us. It consisteth of 7980. yeeres, which results from the multiplication of 19. 28. and 15. that is, of the Cycle of the Moone, the Cycle of the Sunne, and the yeeres of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaveth the number of the present yeere, or if no fraction remaine, it shewes the last yeere of that Cycle to be current. For example, in the 4498. of this Period, when was fought the great battell of Cannæ, the Prime or golden number was 14. the Cycle of the Sun, 18. and consequently the Dominicall letter F. as may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Period 4498. by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sunne. This Julian Period, after the present account, always exceeds the yeeres of the World by 682. Besides the former uses, and other things redounding, it is a better Character of a yeere, than any other Rule (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertaine position. More I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite so such as are conversant in workes of this kinde: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plaine enough to the vulgar.
